PREFACE

This volume aims at providing a text and translation of the elegiac poets contained in the second edition of M. L. West's two volumes, Iambi et Elegi Graeci (Oxford 1989 and 1992). For various reasons, however, a number of poets have been omitted. West includes four of the Seven Sages (Bias, Chilon, Periander, Pittacus) who are reported to have composed elegies, but nothing has survived. Several of the poets in Campbell's Loeb Greek Lyric also composed elegies and these are included in his volumes. The poets involved and the location of their elegies in his five volumes are as follows: Anacreon (ii.146-49), Aristotle (v.218-19), Clonas (ii.330-33 s.v. Polymnestus), Echembrotus (iii.200-201), Ion (iv.360-67), Melanippides (v.14-15), Olympus (ii.272-73), Polymnestus (ii.330-31), Sacadas (iii.202-205), Sappho (i.2-7), Simonides (iii.506-19), Sophocles (iv.330-33), Timocreon (iv.94-97). Some minor poets were not included because of space limitations. Finally, Antimachus has been omitted, since it would be more appropriate to include his elegiac fragments in a translation of his entire remains.

I have not attempted to include all the testimonia, but only those that are significant. Similarly, the apparatus criticus is reduced to what I have judged most important. In some instances a fragment is cited or referred to in several sources, but only the most important are given. The reader can find the others in the editions of West or Gentili-Prato. The numbering of the fragments follows West, that of the testimonia is my own. In my translations I have attempted to provide an English rendering which represents the Greek as closely as possible without being stilted or ambiguous.

It remains to express my deep gratitude to Professors Christopher Brown, Leslie Murison, William Race, Robert Renehan, and Emmet Robbins, who read and commented on substantial portions. Their generosity and expertise are much appreciated.

In English the word 'elegy' has strong threnodic overtones, but that clearly is not true of most of the poems in this volume. Almost any topic, apart from the scurrilous or obscene, was considered suitable for archaic elegy and in this period it is therefore more appropriate to define elegy as simply a poem composed in elegiac couplets. Most of the poems in this volume were presumably composed for performance at symposia and therefore would seldom have exceeded 100 verses, but there is also evidence for elegies of much greater length, poems dealing with the history of a particular state, although none of these has survived intact. In all likelihood these were delivered at public festivals, perhaps for competition. We have an inscription commemorating the victory in the Pythian games of 586 won by Echembrotus of Arcadia, "singing songs and elegies" $(\dot{a}\epsilon\dot{\iota}\delta\omega\nu\ \mu\dot{\epsilon}\lambda\epsilon\alpha\ \kappa\alpha\dot{\iota}\ \dot{\epsilon}\lambda\dot{\epsilon}\gamma\sigma\nu\varsigma)$, but we are not told of the content of these elegies.

¹ The discussion that follows reproduces much that is in my section on elegy in D. E. Gerber (ed.), A Companion to the Greek Lyric Poets (Leiden 1997) 91-132. In addition to the bibliography cited there see K. Bartol, Greek Elegy and Iambus. Studies in Ancient Literary Sources (Poznan 1993).

² For a succinct account of its metrical characteristics see M. L. West, Greek Metre (Oxford 1982) 44-46.

In the passage just cited we have the earliest example of the word $\ell \lambda \epsilon \gamma o_S$ (elegos). It next appears in Euripides and Aristophanes where the meaning is similar to that of its English derivative, namely, a poem or song of lamentation. This, however, is probably a later development, prompted perhaps by the regular practice in the fifth century of composing epigrams on the dead in elegiac couplets. In the inscription of Echembrotus there is nothing to indicate the contents of his elegies. The contrast with $\mu \epsilon \lambda \epsilon \alpha$ (songs) may point to a difference in musical accompaniment, the former accompanied by a stringed instrument and the latter by a wind instrument, but it is also possible that elegos is here essentially a metrical term. Such is clearly the meaning in one of the earliest occurrences of ἐλεγεῖον (elegeion), since Critias (see fr. 4) states that Alcibiades' name cannot be accommodated ἐλεγείω, i.e., either to the elegiac couplet as a whole or more specifically to the pentameter. In the fourth century we meet the form ἐλεγεία (elegeia), as in the introduction to Solon frr. 4a and 4b, and here too it is a metrical term. In fact, elegeion and elegeia are essentially synonyms, denoting a poem or, in the plural, a collection of poems in elegiac couplets.

The etymology of elegos is unclear. The ancient lexicographers postulated a variety of derivations, and others have been proposed by modern scholars, the likeliest being a derivation from Armenian elegn, reed. A reed instrument, the aulos (pipe or oboe),⁵ was certainly used to accompany elegies at times and, although the evidence is somewhat problematic, I agree with those who argue that it provided the regular accompaniment.

Callinus

Callinus was a native of Ephesus in Ionia and can be dated to the middle of the 7th century. Strabo (test. 1) claims that he is older than Archilochus because the latter referred to the destruction of the Magnesians, whereas Callinus mentions their prosperity; but only a short period may have elapsed between the two references. All the meagre remains of Callinus are concerned with warfare, especially the fighting against the Cimmerians who came down from the eastern area of the Black Sea into Phrygia and Lydia and succeeded in burning the temple of Artemis in Ephesus.

The one substantial fragment of Callinus is an attempt to rouse his countrymen from their inactivity and to display the utmost courage in battle. It is a fine example of martial poetry, superior to that of Tyrtaeus on the same topic.

Tyrtaeus

A number of our sources (testt. 1-8) state that when the Spartans were embroiled in the Second Messenian War

 5 On the aulos see M. L. West, $Ancient\ Greek\ Music$ (Oxford 1992) 81-109.

(latter part of the 7th century) they received an oracle from Delphi to obtain an adviser from Athens, and the Athenians sent them Tyrtaeus, a lame schoolmaster. Whatever truth there is in all this, what has survived of his poetry is concerned primarily with two issues: exhortations to the Spartans to fight with the utmost bravery and support for the government of the state, probably as a result of civil strife arising from setbacks in the war.

The three longest fragments (10-12) describe the ideal soldier and the disgrace that attends those who are cowardly. Their poetic quality, however, is uneven. Although there is some striking imagery, there are also awkward transitions, repetition, and padding. Like Callinus' verses, there is indebtedness to epic language, but unlike Callinus, Tyrtaeus is not averse to following closely a lengthy Homeric passage, as a comparison between Iliad 22.66-76 and fr. 8.19-30 illustrates.

It is sometimes said that Tyrtaeus' poetry is representative of the only kind of literature that was accepted in Sparta in his time, but in fact in contrast to two centuries later there is ample evidence that the visual arts were flourishing and that several poets and musicians visited Sparta. In addition, we must remember that Alcman, also Spartan, was roughly contemporary with Tyrtaeus, and his poetry is very different.

Mimnermus

The Suda (test. 1) assigns the poet's floruit to 632-29 and this seems to be substantially correct. In fr. 14 Mimnermus states that he learned from his elders of the exploits of a hero who routed the Lydian cavalry and if this refers to the defeat of Gyges by the Smyrnaeans in the 660s, Mimnermus will have been born not long before. Mimnermus seems to be urging the citizens to emulate this hero and the occasion may be the attack of Alyattes, the fourth king of Lydia, who succeeded in razing Smyrna about 600.

In test. 1 the Suda gives Mimnermus' homeland as either Colophon or Smyrna, and in several sources he is referred to as simply a Colophonian. Fr. 9, however, and the fact that he composed a Smyrneis (fr. 13a) strongly suggest that he was from Smyrna. The error may have arisen from his having frequently mentioned Colophon. Also, in contrast to Smyrna "Colophon had a continuous tradition down to Hellenistic times" (West, Studies 72) and was the homeland of such famous poets as Xenophanes and Antimachus.

According to test. 9 Mimnermus' poems were collected in two books, but he is never cited from a specific book. Instead, we have six fragments (4, 5, 8, 10, 12, 24) assigned to a work entitled Nanno and one (13a) to a Smyrneis. Since the former embrace a wide range of topics, it is probable that the title Nanno was given to a collection of poems. The fact that the Smyrneis contained a proem in which the double genealogy of the Muses was given (fr. 13) suggests that it was of substantial length. If we are to believe testt. 3 and 4, Nanno was a pipe-player loved by Mimnermus.

Horace and Propertius (testt. 11-12) speak of Mimnermus as a love poet, but only fr. 1 has much to say on this topic and even here the emphasis is on the brevity of youth and the horrors of old age (as in frr. 2-5). Regardless of the subject matter, however, Mimnermus is a consummate poet and it is not surprising that he made such an impression on Hellenistic and Roman poets.

Solon

In the year 594/93 Solon was made archon in Athens and he lived until shortly after Pisistratus became tyrant in 560. Much of his surviving poetry falls into clearly defined periods: before his archonship, afterwards when he defends his reforms, and in his last years when he warns the Athenians against supporting Pisistratus. A ten-year period after his archonship was spent in travel, to Egypt and Cyprus (frr. 19 and 28).

Solon is not to be included among poets of the highest rank, but he also does not deserve the low esteem in which he is sometimes held. Fr. 4, for example, with its effective use of personification, imagery, anaphora, and chiasmus, reveals a high level of poetic skill. Fr. 13, however, the longest elegy we have from the archaic period and perhaps a complete poem, is of poorer quality. Because of its lack of cohesiveness it has generated a considerable bibliography, as critics attempt to explain the train of thought and central theme. But for all its imperfections it shows us a more reflective and philosophical Solon than we find in most of his other verses and thereby fills out our picture of the man.

Some of Solon's fragments are in iambic trimeters and trochaic tetrameters, but their contents do not differ from many in elegiac meter, an indication that the distinction usually found between elegy and iambus in Archilochus no longer applies.

Theognis

Under the name Theognis is a collection of poems which most would agree represents an anthology containing genuine works of Theognis, selections from other elegists (e.g., Tyrtaeus, Mimnermus, Solon), and anonymous poems, together with numerous verses repeated throughout the corpus, usually with some slight variation. Disagreement arises, however, concerning how and when the anthology was formed and what segments should be assigned to Theognis.⁶

Almost nothing is known about Theognis the man, except that he was an aristocrat living in Megara during a period of political turmoil when class distinctions were breaking down. There is some evidence that he went into exile. The Suda (test. 1) dates his floruit to 544/41 and this may be substantially correct, but our uncertainty about the authorship of certain segments makes his dating highly problematic.

Many of the poems are addressed to a boy Cyrnus, who is also called by his patronymic Polypaïdes, and in most instances these contain admonitions to abide by aristocratic ideals. Some critics treat the presence of Cyrnus' name as proof of authenticity, but the name could easily have been added by someone who wished to pass off his verses as the work of Theognis.

The collection as we have it begins with four short invocations, followed by a very controversial segment (vv. 19 ff.) in which the poet mentions a seal that is to be placed on his verses. This has the appearance of a prologue and in vv. 237-54 we seem to have an epilogue. The intervening verses are more cohesive than those which follow and 19-254 may represent in large part the earliest collection of his poetry. Finally, at some stage the pederastic segments were gathered together to form Book II.

Except for Homer, Hesiod, and the Homeric Hymns, the elegies of Theognis represent the earliest poems to have been preserved in manuscripts of their own. Since these elegies are clearly not all the work of Theognis, it would be more accurate to refer to them as Theognidea, but I have used the term Theognis throughout.

Xenophanes

Xenophanes is better known as a pre-Socratic philosopher, but only the elegiac fragments will be considered here. Born in Colophon about 565, he left when the Medes overran his city in the late 540s and spent the rest of his life in various places in Magna Graecia (see test. 1 and fr. 8). He died about 470.

In addition to the poems in hexameters, most of which are concerned with the nature of deity and with explanations of natural phenomena (wind, rain, celestial bodies), we are told that he also composed iambic poetry. None of this has survived, but we do have one fragment (see n. 5 on test. 1) consisting of an iambic trimeter followed by a dactylic hexameter, and hexameters interspersed with trimeters may have been more common, especially when the poem had the character of a lampoon (see n. 1 on test. 2).

The three major elegiac fragments have as their subject matter the ideal symposium, criticism of the excessive esteem in which athletes are held, and a denunciation of the soft life led by Colophonian aristocrats. One thread which runs throughout all three is the emphasis on usefulness.

Minor Poets

Little can be said about the remaining poets that is not obvious from the testimonia or fragments. Some are very shadowy figures and the chronological order in which they are placed is extremely tentative. The Adespota contain two fragments (61 and 62) which might be the work of Archilochus.

1 Strabo, Geography

And in ancient times it happened that the Magnesians, who had long been prosperous, were utterly destroyed at the hands of the Treres, a Cimmerian tribe, and that in the following year the Milesians took possession of the place. Now Callinus mentions the Magnesians as still prosperous and as successful in their war with the Ephesians, but Archilochus is clearly already aware of the disaster that befell them, < since he says that > he bewails the woes of the Thasians, not those of the Magnesians. As a result one may infer that he is later than Callinus. 1

¹ For the same chronology see Arch. test. 8. Athenaeus 12.525c cites both Callinus and Archilochus as sources for the destruction of the Magnesians at the hands of the Ephesians.

When the Teucrians arrived from Crete—Callinus the elegiac poet was the first to hand down an account of them and many have followed him—they had an oracle which told them to stay wherever the earth-born attacked them. And they say that this happened to them round Hamaxitus, 1 for by night a great horde of field mice burst forth and devoured all the leather on their arms and utensils, and there they stayed. And it was they who gave the name Ida (to the mountain) after the Ida in Crete.

FRAGMENTS

1 Stobaeus, Anthology

From Callinus:

How long are you going to lie idle? Young men, when will you have a courageous spirit? Don't those who live round about make you feel ashamed of being so utterly passive? You think that you are sitting in a state of peace, but all the land is in the grip of war¹...² even as one is dying let him make a final cast of his javelin. For it is a splendid honour for a man to fight on behalf of his land, children, and wedded wife against the foe. Death will occur only when the Fates have spun it out. Come, let a man charge straight ahead, brandishing his spear and mustering a stout heart behind his shield, as soon as war is engaged. For it is in no way fated that a man escape death, not even if he has immortal ancestors in his lineage. Often one who has escaped from the strife of battle and the thud of javelins and has returned home meets with his allotted death in his

CALLINUS

4 Stephanus of Byzantium, Lexicon of Place-names Treros is a place in Thrace and the Treres are a Thracian tribe. The word has three syllables in the poet Callinus:

bringing Trerian men

Theopompus calls them Trares.

5 Strabo, Geography

And Callinus mentions another, earlier invasion of the Cimmerians when he says:

now the horde of Cimmerians, with their acts of violence, is advancing, by which he is clearly referring to the capture of Sardis.1

TYRTAEUS

1 Suda

Tyrtaeus, son of Archembrotus, a Laconian or Milesian¹ elegiac poet and pipe-player. It is said that by means of his songs he urged on the Lacedaemonians in their war with the Messenians and in this way enabled them to get the upper hand. He is very ancient, contemporary with those called the Seven Sages, or even earlier. He flourished in the 35th Olympiad (640-637).² He wrote a constitution³ for the Lacedaemonians, precepts⁴ in elegiac verse, and war songs,⁵ in five books.6

Tyrtaeus. The Lacedaemonians swore that they would either capture Messene or die, and when the god gave them an oracle to take a general from the Athenians, they took the poet Tyrtaeus, a man who was lame. By exhorting them to valour he captured Messene in the 20th year. They razed it and grouped the prisoners among the helots.

³ Perhaps a reference to the Eunomia (see frr. 1-2). ⁴ Frr. 10-12 and 18-23a may be included in this category. ⁵ None of these has survived, since those ascribed to Tyrtaeus (frr. 856-57 PMG) are considered spurious. ⁶ No source cites from a specific book. ⁷ See testt. ³ and ⁷. ⁸ A confusion arising from fr. 5.7. Tyrtaeus lived during the Second, not the First, Messenian War.

TYRTAEUS

Athenian Origin

2 Plato, Laws

Let us cite in support Tyrtaeus, who was an Athenian by birth but became a citizen of the Lacedaemonians; he beyond all others had a keen interest in these matters, saying "I would not mention or take account of a man," though he were the richest of men or possessed many good things—he mentions almost all of them—, if he were not always the best in war. Presumably you too have heard these poems.

¹ The Athenian origin of Tyrtaeus is cited, and elaborated on, by a large number of sources. It is generally treated as an example of Athenian propaganda, in spite of the fact that Plato, our earliest authority, was an admirer of Sparta.
² Fr. 12.1. See n. ad loc.

3 Scholiast on the passage

This Tyrtaeus was an Athenian, one whose station in life was lowly; for he was a schoolmaster, lame, and looked down upon at Athens. Apollo gave the Lacedaemonians an oracle to send for him, when they were fighting the Messenians and were in great difficulty, since he would suffice for them to see what was to their advantage. Apollo ordered them to use him as an adviser.

5 Philodemus, On Music¹

With regard to the Lacedaemonians' use of pipes and lyres whenever they struck up a tune at the onset of battle, there is no need to say anything more. But that they took Tyrtaeus and honoured him above others because of his music does not seem to be recorded, since almost everyone agrees that he had been sent for from Athens in accordance with an oracle and most people know that he was a poet and that by means of poems which contained noble thoughts . . .

¹ I have printed the text as it will appear in D. Dellatre's edition. For this text and an analysis of the passage see E. Puglia, "Tirteo nei papiri ercolanesi," Miscellanea Papyrologica I (Florence 1990) 27-35. He also discusses a citation of fr. 10.15-16 in these papyri and its relevance for the debate whether fr. 10 represents one poem or two.

6 Diodorus Siculus, World History

When the Spartans suffered defeat at the hands of the Messenians they sent to Delphi and asked about the war. The god advised them in an oracle to procure a leader from the Athenians. The Lacedaemonians, urged on by Tyrtaeus, were so eager for battle that when they were about to be drawn up in battle order they wrote their names on a small stick and tied it on their arms, in order

¹ This detail is also recorded by Polyaenus 1.17 and Justin 3.5. In 15.66.3 Diodorus again mentions Tyrtaeus' Athenian origin.

7 Pausanias, Description of Greece

The Lacedaemonians received an oracle from Delphi to procure the Athenian as counsellor. They therefore despatched messengers to the Athenians to announce the oracle and asked for a man to advise them what they should do. The Athenians, unwilling either that the Lacedaemonians should annex the best part of the Peloponnese without great risk or that they themselves should take no heed of the god, devised accordingly. There was a schoolmaster, Tyrtaeus, who seemed to have little sense¹ and who was lame in one foot,² and they sent him to Sparta.³ Upon his arrival he sang his elegiac and anapaestic verses, both privately to those in office and to as many as he could gather together.

² Porphyr. in Hor. A.P. 402 (p. 176 Holder) adds that he was also 'one-eyed' (luscum).

³ That the Athenians sent Tyrtaeus as an insult to the Spartans is recorded by Ampelius 14 (per ludibrium), Justin 3.5 (in contemptum), and ps.-Acron in Hor. A.P. 402 (in contumeliam).

8 Plutarch, Sayings of Spartans

When someone asked why they had made the poet Tyrtaeus a citizen, Pausanias said: "so that a foreigner

9 Inscription (3rd c. B.C.)

Stranger, the dust that brings glory to men conceals here in its bosom Timocritus, honoured by the Muses. For when the brave man came into conflict with the sons of the Aetolians on behalf of his homeland, it was his desire either to be victorious or to die. He fell among the front ranks and left his father with pain beyond measure, but he did not lose sight of his noble upbringing. Taking to heart the Spartan declaration of Tyrtaeus, he chose valour ahead of life.¹

¹ P. Friedländer, AJP 63 (1942) 78-82, argues that the author is Damagetus, several of whose epigrams are included in the Anthologia Graeca. Whoever the author is, he is clearly echoing passages in Tyrtaeus.

10 Athenaeus, Scholars at Dinner

Furthermore, factions arise whenever some (aristocrats) are extremely poor and others are well off. And this happens especially during wars; it happened too in Sparta in the course of the Messenian War, as is clear from the poem of Tyrtaeus called Eunomia. For some, hard pressed because of the war, demanded a redistribution of the land.

- 1 Perhaps 'Law and Order' is an adequate rendering of the word. As A. Andrewes, "Eunomia," CQ 32 (1938) 89-102, explains, the word describes "a condition of the state in which citizens obey the law, not a condition of the state in which the laws are good" (p. 89).

Strabo, Geography

For Tyrtaeus says that he came from there⁶ in the elegy entitled Eunomia (vv. 12-15). Consequently we must either deny the validity of these elegiac verses or we must disbelieve Philochorus, who said that Tyrtaeus was an Athenian and Aphidnean,⁷ and Callisthenes and a great many others who said that he came from Athens when the Spartans asked for him in accordance with an oracle which instructed them to obtain a leader from Athens.

In what precedes v. 9 there are references to consultation of the Delphic oracle and to men standing up, presumably to speak.

After listening to Phoebus they brought home from Pytho the god's oracles and sure predictions. The divinely honoured kings, in whose care is Sparta's lovely city, and the aged elders are to initiate counsel; and then the men of the people, responding with straight utterances, are to speak fair words, act justly in everything, and not give the city (crooked) counsel. Victory and power are to accompany the mass of the people. For so was Phoebus' revelation about this to the city.¹

¹ The text is a combination from Plutarch and Diodorus, but there are many who argue that vv. 7-10 should not be assigned to Tyrtaeus and a few who print the first two verses from Plutarch followed by the entire text of Diodorus. ... Afterwards, however, when the multitude distorted and perverted proposals by subtraction and addition, the kings Polydorus and Theopompus subjoined the following:

If the people should speak crookedly, the elders and kings are to be setters-aside.

- . . . And they actually persuaded the city that the god ordered this, as Tyrtaeus mentions in these verses (1-6).²
- 2 The rider is not in fact mentioned in the verses cited by Plutarch.

Excerpts from Didorus Siculus, World History

That the same Lycurgus brought an oracle from Delphi concerning love of money and its memory is preserved in the form of a proverb:

Love of money and nothing else will destroy Sparta.³

The Pythia gave Lycurgus the following oracle about the constitution (marginal comment).

For thus Apollo who works from afar, the goldenhaired lord of the silver bow, prophesied from his rich shrine:

(vv. 3-10)

³ Bergk inserted this in his fr. 3, but there is no reason to assign it to Tyrtaeus, hence the omission of fr. 3 in West's edition.

For nineteen years the spearmen fathers of our fathers fought ever unceasingly over it, displaying steadfast courage in their hearts, and in the twentieth year the enemy fled from the high mountain range of Ithome, abandoning their rich farmlands.¹

It was this Theopompus who put an end to the war and my evidence is the elegiac verses of Tyrtaeus which say (vv. 1-2).

Upon arriving in Lacedaemon and becoming inspired Tyrtaeus advised them to wage war against the Messenians, urging them on by every means possible, including the famous verse (v. 3).

Strabo, Geography

Messene was captured after a war of nineteen years, as Tyrtaeus says (vv. 4-8).

6 Pausanias, Description of Greece

As for the Messenians themselves they received the following treatment from the Lacedaemonians. First they exacted from them an oath never to revolt or to engage in any other act of rebellion. Second, they imposed no fixed tribute on them, but they brought to Sparta half of all their farm produce. And there was also a proclamation that the men come from Messenia with their wives dressed in black to the funerals of the kings and of other officials, and punishment was imposed on the transgressors. As for the penalties with which they mistreated the Messenians, there are the verses composed by Tyrtaeus:

like asses worn out by heavy burdens, bringing to their masters out of grievous necessity half of all the produce that the land brings forth.

7 Pausanias continues

And that they were forced to share in their mourning Tyrtaeus has shown as follows:

wailing for their masters, they and their wives alike, whenever the baneful lot of death came upon any.

8 Strabo, Geography

On more than one occasion they went to war because of the revolts of the Messenians. Tyrtaeus says in his poems that the first conquest of them took place at the time of the fathers' fathers, the second at the time when the Messenians chose Argives, Arcadians(?),¹ and Pisatans as allies and revolted, the Arcadians providing Aristocrates, king of Orchomenus, as general, and the Pisatans providing Pantaleon the son of Omphalion, at which time Tyrtaeus says that he himself served as general in the war for the Lacedaemonians.

Eustratius on the passage

One could say this about the Lacedaemonians; for when they waged war against the Messenians, such was their manner of fighting, as Tyrtaeus mentions.

¹ It may be significant that a trench seems to be mentioned in fr. 23a.19.

10 Lycurgus, Against Leocrates

And although they took no account of other poets, they placed such high value on him that they passed a law that whenever they took to the field under arms they should all be called to the king's tent to listen to the poems of Tyrtaeus, judging that by so doing they would be especially willing to die for their homeland. And it is useful for you to listen to these elegiac verses, so that you may know by what kind of deeds they won esteem in their eyes:

It is a fine thing for a brave man to die when he has fallen among the front ranks while fighting for his homeland, and it is the most painful thing of all to leave one's city and rich fields for a beggar's life, wandering about with his dear mother and aged father, with small children and wedded wife. For giving way to need and hateful poverty, he will be treated with hostility by whomever he meets, he brings disgrace on his line, belies his splendid form, and every indignity and evil attend him. If then there is no regard or respect for a man who wanders thus, nor yet for his family after him, let us fight with spirit for this land and let us die for our children, no longer sparing our lives. Come, you young men, stand fast at one another's side and fight, and do not start shameful flight or panic, but make the spirit in your heart strong and valiant, and do not be in love of life when you are fighting men. Do not abandon and run away from elders, whose knees are no longer nimble, men revered. For this brings shame, when an older man lies fallen among the front ranks with the young behind him, his head already white and his beard grey, breathing out his valiant spirit in the dust, clutching in his hands his bloodied genitals—this is a shameful sight and brings indignation to behold—his body naked. But for the young everything is seemly, as long as he has the splendid prime of lovely youth; while alive, men marvel at the sight of him and women feel desire, and when he has fallen among the front ranks, he is fair. Come, let everyone stand fast, with legs set well apart and both feet fixed firmly on the ground, biting his lip with his teeth 1

From Tyrtaeus:

Come, take courage, for your stock is from unconquered Heracles1—not yet does Zeus hold his neck aslant2—and do not fear throngs of men or run in flight, but let a man hold his shield straight toward the front ranks, despising life and loving the black death-spirits no less than the rays of the sun. You know how destructive the deeds of woeful Ares are. you have learned well the nature of grim war, you have been with the pursuers and the pursued, you young men, and you have had more than your fill of both. Those who dare to stand fast at one another's side and to advance towards the front ranks in handto-hand conflict, they die in fewer numbers and they keep safe the troops behind them;3 but when men run away, all esteem4 is lost. No one could sum up in words each and every evil that befalls a man, if he suffers disgrace. For to pierce a man behind the shoulder blades as he flees in deadly combat is gruesome, 5 and a corpse lying in the dust, with the point of a spear driven through his back from behind, is a shameful sight. Come, let everyone stand fast, with legs set well apart and both feet fixed firmly on the ground, biting his lip with his teeth, and covering thighs, shins below, chest, and shoulders with the belly of his broad shield;6 in his right hand let him brandish a mighty spear and let him shake the plumed crest above his head in a fearsome manner. By doing mighty deeds let him learn how to fight and let him not stand—he has a shield—outside the range of missiles, but coming to close quarters let him strike the enemy, hitting him with long spear or sword; and also, with foot placed alongside foot and shield pressed against shield, let everyone draw near, crest to crest, helmet to helmet, and breast to breast, and fight against a man, seizing the hilt of his sword or his long spear. You light-armed men, as you crouch beneath a shield on either side, let fly with huge rocks and hurl your smooth javelins at them, standing close to those in full armour.

For no man is good in war unless he can endure the sight of bloody slaughter and, standing close, can lunge at the enemy. This is excellence, this the best human prize and the fairest for a young man to win. This is a common benefit for the state and all the people, whenever a man with firm stance among the front ranks never ceases to hold his ground, is utterly unmindful of shameful flight, risking his life and displaying a steadfast spirit, and standing by the man next to him speaks encouragingly. This man is good in war. He quickly routs the bristling ranks of the enemy and by his zeal stems the tide of battle. And if he falls among the front ranks, pierced many times through his breast and bossed shield8 and corselet from the front, he loses his own dear life but brings glory to his city, to his people, and to his father. Young and old alike mourn him, all the city is distressed by the painful loss, and his tomb and children are pointed out among the people, and his children's children and his line after them. Never do his name and good fame perish, but even though he is beneath the earth he is immortal, whoever it is that furious Ares slays as he displays his prowess by standing fast and fighting for land and children. And if he escapes the doom of death that brings long sorrow and by his victory makes good his spear's splendid boast, he is honoured by all, young and old alike, many are the joys he experiences before he goes to Hades, and in his old age he stands out among the townsmen; no one seeks to deprive him of respect and his just rights, but all men at the benches yield their place to him, the young, those of his own age, and the elders. Let everyone strive now with all his heart to reach the pinnacle of this excellence, with no slackening in war.

¹ Plato, Laws 1.629a-630b (see test. 2), quotes vv. 1 and, with slight changes, most of 11-12 and paraphrases the contents of 1-20; in 660e-661a he again quotes v. 1 and paraphrases 1-12. We also have 13-16 in Theognis 1003-1006 (with $\sigma o \phi \hat{\omega}$ in place of $\nu \dot{\epsilon} \omega$) and much of 37-42 is repeated in Theognis 935-38. ² The North Wind. ³ A Trojan youth, brother of Priam, with whom the goddess Eos fell in love.

13 Galen, On the Doctrines of Hippocrates and Plato

For just as a short time ago I cited as evidence a few passages which Chrysippus took from Homer and Hesiod, οὕτως ἐξ 'Ορφέως καὶ 'Εμπεδοκλέους καὶ Τυρταίου καὶ Στησιχόρου καὶ Εὐριπίδου καὶ ἐτέρων ποιητῶν ἐπῶν μνημονεύει παμπόλ<λ>ων ὁμοίαν ἐχόντων ἀτοπίαν, οἷον καὶ ὅταν εἴπη Τυρταῖον λέγοντα so he mentions a great many verses from Orpheus, Empedocles, Tyrtaeus, Stesichorus, Euripides, and other poets which are similarly inept, such as when he speaks of Tyrtaeus as saying with a tawny lion's spirit in his (your) breast.

For we all know very well that a lion has spirit, even before listening to Tyrtaeus, and it was quite inappropriate for Chrysippus to cite the verse since he denies spirit to lions. . . . But Tyrtaeus, like Homer and Hesiod and in short all poets, says that lions have the most violent spirit, and as a result they compare to a lion anyone who is extremely spirited.

14 Plutarch, On Stoic Self-Contradictions

And it is not necessary to unroll other books as a display of Chrysippus in conflict with himself, since in these books themselves he now cites with approval the saying of Antisthenes that there is need to acquire intelligence or the noose and that of Tyrtaeus:

TESTIMONIA

1 Suda

Mimnermus, son of Ligyrtyades, from Colophon or Smyrna or Astypalaea,¹ an elegiac poet. He flourished in the 37th Olympiad (632-29) and so is earlier than the Seven Sages, although some say that he was their contemporary. He was also called Ligyaistades² because of his harmonious clarity. He wrote . . . books.³

¹ An island in the southern Aegean and clearly an error (see Allen 13 n. 17). Fr. 9 strongly suggests that he was from Smyrna and the mention of both Colophon and Smyrna in that fragment may have contributed to the confusion.

² Probably derived from Solon fr. 20.3.

³ For possible restorations of the corruption (lit. "these many books") see Allen 23 n. 9. Perhaps the text originally said something like "He wrote two books containing many poems."

2 Strabo, Geography

Among the Colophonians¹ who are remembered there were Mimnermus, who was both a pipe-player and an elegiac poet, and Xenophanes the natural philosopher . . .

I have also omitted Mimnermus' pipe-player Nanno and the Leontion of Hermesianax¹ of Colophon.

4 Hermesianax

And Mimnermus, who after much suffering¹ discovered the sweet sound and breath given off by the soft pentameter, was on fire for Nanno, and often with his lips encircled(?) on the grey lotus-pipe he would hold revel with Examyes. But he . . . the ever grievous Hermobius and hostile Pherecles,² hating the kind of verses he (Pherecles?) sent forth.

If correctly translated, this implies that he took up poetry as a result of unhappy love affairs, but perhaps the meaning is "after much perseverence." ² Possibly Hermobius resisted Mimnermus' advances, but responded to the love poetry of Pherecles. For attempts to restore the introductory verb see Allen 19.

Florentine scholia on the passage

He places in comparison the poems of a few lines of Mimnermus the Colophonian and of Philetas the Coan, declaring that they are better than their own poems of many lines.¹

¹ The two verses of Callimachus (together with the surrounding verses omitted here) and the remarks of the scholiast have been the subject of much controversy, which is conveniently summarized by Allen 146-56. I have adopted his conclusions, namely, that 'the big lady' is the Smyrneis (cf. fr. 13A) and 'the slender verses' the short poems making up the Nanno.

11 Horace, Epistles

From Mimnermus:

What life is there, what pleasure without golden Aphrodite? May I die when I no longer care about secret intrigues, persuasive gifts, and the bed,¹ those blossoms of youth that men and women find alluring. 2 Stobaeus, Anthology

From Mimnermus:

We are like the leaves which the flowery season of spring brings forth, when they quickly grow beneath the rays of the sun; like them we delight in the flowers of youth for an arm's length of time, knowing neither the bad nor the good that comes from the gods. 1 But the dark spirits of doom stand beside us, one holding grievous old age as the outcome, the other death. Youth's fruit is short-lived, lasting as long as the sunlight spreads over the earth.2 And when the end of this season passes by, straightway death is better than life. For many are the miseries that beset one's heart. Sometimes a man's estate wastes away and a painful life of poverty is his; another in turn lacks sons and longing for them most of all he goes beneath the earth to Hades; another has soul-destroying illness. There is no one to whom Zeus does not give a multitude of ills.

¹ Precise meaning debated, but perhaps a reference to life's changing fortunes, which cannot be known in advance.
² I.e., for a day.

4 Stobaeus, Anthology

From Mimnermus' Nanno:

He¹ gave Tithonus² an everlasting evil, old age, which is more terrible than even woeful death.

 1 No doubt Zeus. 2 Brother of Priam and loved by Eos, who asked Zeus to make him immortal, but neglected to ask for eternal youth as well.

5 Stobaeus, Anthology¹

From Mimnermus' Nanno

But precious youth is like a fleeting dream; in no time grievous and hideous old age, hateful as well as dishonoured, hangs over one's head. It makes a man unrecognisable and hampers eyes and mind when it is poured round.

¹ Vv. 1-3 also appear as Theognis 1020-22 and some, including West, assign the three preceding verses in Theognis to Mimnermus. Gentili-Prato combine frr. 4 and 5, with a lacuna after fr. 4. For opposition to both views see Allen 59-61.

Let there be truth between you and me; of all possessions it is the most just.¹

9 Strabo, Geography

Later, upon being expelled by the Aeolians, they (the Smyrnaeans) fled to Colophon and upon attacking their own land with the Colophonians they regained it, as Mimnermus states in his Nanno, after mentioning that Smyrna was always an object of contention:

 1 Some see here a mention of $A i\pi \acute{v},$ a town in Messenia. This is defended by C. Brillante in $Scritti\ldots Gentili$ I (Rome 1993) 267-78 who however locates both Aipy and Pylos in Triphylia, northwest of Messenia. For a full discussion of both textual and historical problems in the fragment see Allen 75-85. 2 The corruption must conceal the name of the river. The two candidates, Meles and Ales, both present problems. The Meles is near Smyrna, not Colophon, and the Ales is south of Colophon, whereas Smyrna lies to the north.

Andraemon of Pylos¹ founded Colophon, as Mimnermus says in his Nanno.

But if it is as Demetrius of Scepsis states, calling upon the authority of Mimnermus who places the dwelling of Aeetes in Oceanus far out at the rising of the sun and says that Jason was sent by Pelias and brought back the fleece, the expedition for it there, to unknown and obscure regions, would not sound plausible, and a voyage through desolate, uninhabited territory so far removed from us would be neither famous nor of interest to everyone.

Jason would never have brought back the great fleece from Aea¹ on his own² at the end of a painful journey, completing for the insolent Pelias an ordeal fraught with difficulty, nor would they have reached the fair stream of Oceanus.³

 1 Apparently identified here with Colchis, the traditional home of Aeetes at the eastern end of the Black Sea. Homer uses the adjectival equivalent $(A i a i \eta)$ of Circe's island $(Od.\ 10.135, 12.3)$ and Circe was the sister of Aeetes. 2 Probably an allusion to Hera's aid rather than to Medea's or Aphrodite's, since the latter two had nothing to do with the arrival at Oceanus (v. 4). 3 Chronological order is inverted in order to give prominence to recovery of the fleece.

11a Strabo continues

And further on:

12 Athenaeus, Scholars at Dinner

In Nanno Mimnermus says that the Sun is conveyed to the place of his rising while he sleeps in a golden bed constructed for this purpose by Hephaestus. Mimnermus hints at the hollow shape of the cup, speaking as follows:

For the Sun's lot is toil every day and there is never any respite for him and his horses, from the moment rose-fingered Dawn leaves Oceanus and goes up into the sky. A lovely bed, hollow, forged by the hands of Hephaestus, of precious gold and winged,

21 Sallustius' preface to Sophocles, Antigone

There is disagreement in the stories told of the heroine (Antigone) and her sister Ismene. Ion in his dithyrambs says that both were burned to death in Hera's temple by Laodamas, the son of Eteocles. But Mimnermus says that Ismene was killed by Tydeus at the command of Athena when she was making love to Periclymenus. These then are the strange stories told about the heroines.

Scythians. But Antianeira, the leader of the Amazons, replied to them: "a lame man makes the best lover." Mimnermus recalls the proverb.¹

¹ As it stands, the proverb is iambic, but there is no evidence that Mimnermus composed in this meter. It is possible, however, that he adapted it to the elegiac meter or simply alluded to it in a more general way. Other sources cite the proverb without mentioning Mimnermus. According to Strabo 14.1.4 Smyrna was named after an homonymous Amazon.

22 Scholiast on Lycophron

According to Mimnermus, because Aphrodite had been wounded by Diomedes she caused (his wife) Aegialeia to go to bed with many lovers and to be loved by Cometes, the son of Sthenelus. And when Diomedes arrived in Argos she plotted against him. He took refuge at the altar of Hera but fled during the night with his companions and went to Italy to king Daunus, who killed him by a trick.

TESTIMONIUM

Much of our information about Solon can be found in Aristotle's Constitution of Athens, Plutarch's Life of Solon, and Diogenes Laertius 1.45-67. all available in Loeb editions. Herodotus 1.29-33 gives an account of Solon's visit to Croesus, king of Lydia, but this is improbable on chronological grounds, since Croesus became ruler c. 560 and Solon died about a year later (see n. 2 below). Solon, son of Execestides,¹ an Athenian philosopher, law-giver and leader of the people. He flourished in the 47th Olympiad (592/89), according to others in the 56th (556/3).² When the tyrant Pisistratus plotted against him, he spent time abroad in Cilicia and founded a city which he called Soloi after himself.³ Others say that also Soloi in Cyprus was named after him and that he died in Cyprus.⁴ He wrote laws for the Athenians which were given the name axones⁵ because they were written on wooden axles in Athens. He wrote an elegiac poem entitled Salamis,⁶ elegiac exhortations, and others.⁷ He is also one of the Seven See introduction to fr. 22a.

 The first date is close to that commonly assigned to his archonship (594/3), the latter close to the probable year of his death. According to Phaenias (fr. 21 Wehrli), as reported by Plutarch (Solon 32.3), Solon lived less than two years after Pisistratus became tyrant (560/59).
 A few other sources also mention this (e.g., Diog. Laert. 1.51).
 On Soloi in Cyprus see fr. 19. Diog. Laert. 1.62 claims that Solon died in Cyprus at the age of 80.
 See P. J. Rhodes, A Commentary on the Aristotelian Athenaion Politeia (Oxford 1981) 131-35, for a thorough discussion of the word.
 Frr. 1-3.
 Diog. Laert. 1.61 states that Solon's elegies contained 5000 lines and he adds that Solon also composed iambic poems and epodes.

FRAGMENTS

1-3. Salamis

1 Plutarch, Life of Solon

No mention is made elsewhere of the latter.

When the Athenians grew tired of waging a long and difficult war with Megara over the island Salamis, they passed a law that in future no one, on pain of death, was to propose in writing or orally that the city should lay claim to Salamis. Solon found the disgrace hard to bear and when he saw that many of the young men wanted to renew the war, but lacked the courage to do so themselves because of the law, he pretended to be out of his mind and word was passed from his household to the city that he showed signs of madness. He secretly composed elegiac verses and after practising so as to recite them from memory, he suddenly

I have come in person as a herald from lovely Salamis, composing song, an adornment of words, instead of speech.

This poem was entitled Salamis and contains a hundred lines, a very fine composition.¹

¹ Plutarch goes on to state that the poem had the desired effect. The law was repealed, Solon was placed in command, and Salamis was captured. For other similar accounts of Solon's role see Demosthenes 19.252, Polyaenus 1.20.1, Diogenes Laertius 1.46 et al.

2 Diogenes Laertius, Lives of the Philosophers

The elegiac verses which especially appealed to the Athenians were the following:

In that case may I change my country and be a Pholegandrian or Sikinite¹ instead of an Athenian. For this report would quickly be spread among men: "This man is an Athenian, one of the Salamisceders"

Please take and read these elegiac verses of Solon, so that you (the jury) may know that Solon too hated such men (as the defendant) . . . Now read:

Our state will never perish through the dispensation of Zeus or the intentions of the blessed immortal gods; for such a stout-hearted guardian, Pallas Athena, born of a mighty father, holds her hands over it. But it is the citizens themselves who by their acts of foolishness and subservience to money are willing to destroy a great city, and the mind of the people's leaders is unjust; they are certain to suffer much pain as a result of their great arrogance. For they do not know how to restrain excess or to conduct in an orderly and peaceful manner the festivities of the banquet that are at hand . . . they grow wealthy, yielding to unjust deeds . . . sparing neither sacred nor private property, they steal with rapaciousness, one from one source, one from another, and they have no regard for the august foundations of Justice, who bears silent witness to the present and the past and who in time assuredly comes to exact retribution. This1 is now coming upon the whole city as an inescapable wound and the city has quickly approached wretched slavery,2 which arouses civil strife and slumbering war, the loss for many of their lovely youth. For at the hands of its enemies the much-loved city is being swiftly worn down amid conspiracies dear to the unjust. These are the evils that are rife among the people, and many of the poor are going to a foreign land, sold and bound in shameful fetters . . . And so the public evil comes home to each man and the courtyard gates no longer have the will to hold it back, but it leaps over the high barrier and assuredly finds him out, even if he takes refuge in an innermost corner of his room. This is what my heart bids me teach the Athenians, that Lawlessness brings the city countless ills, but Lawfulness³ reveals all that is orderly and fitting, and often places fetters round the unjust. She makes the rough smooth, puts a stop to excess, weakens insolence, dries up the blooming

You hear, men of Athens, what Solon has to say about such men and about the gods who, he says, keep our city safe.

¹ It is unclear what 'this' refers to. Perhaps it is to the punishment of Justice. ² Probably a reference to tyranny. ³ On these two personifications see M. Ostwald, Nomos and the Beginnings of Athenian Democracy (Oxford 1969) 64-69: "They are 'poetic persons' which symbolize, respectively, the orderly and disorderly state of affairs in the city" (p. 66). ⁴ Or "infatuation." ⁵ Except for lacunae of indeterminate length, the poem may be complete.

4a Aristotle, Constitution of Athens

When such was the organization of the state and many were enslaved to the few, the people rose up against the men of note. After bitter strife and protracted opposition to one another, they agreed to choose Solon as reconciler and archon [594/3], and they entrusted the state to him. He had composed the elegy which begins:

I know (and pain lies within my heart), as I look on the eldest land of Ionia¹ tottering, that . . . ²

In this poem he fights and disputes with each side on behalf of each side, and afterwards he urges them to join in bringing an end to the contention dwelling among them.

¹ Athens claimed to be the mother city of all Ionians.
² My translation assumes that the sentence is incomplete, but if it is complete I would translate as follows: "I realize that I am looking on the eldest land of Ionia tottering, and pain lies within my heart."

4c Aristotle continues

Solon was by birth and reputation one of the leading citizens, but by property and business dealings one of the middle class, as is agreed on from other sources and as he himself attests in these poems, where he urges the rich not to be greedy:

You who had more than your fill of many good things, calm the stern heart within your breast and moderate your ambition; for we shall not comply nor will these things be fitting for you.

4b Aristotle continues

And in short he always lays the blame for the strife on the rich. That is why he says at the beginning of the elegy that he fears their . . . and their arrogance, 1 suggesting that this was the cause of the hostility.

But Solon himself says that at first he undertook public life reluctantly and in fear of one side's love of money and the other side's arrogance.

¹ On the basis of Plutarch many see a pentameter lurking here, $\tau \dot{\eta} \nu \ \phi \iota \lambda o \chi \rho \eta \mu a \tau \iota a \nu$ (vel sim.) $\tau \dot{\eta} \nu \ \theta' \ \dot{\nu} \pi \epsilon \rho \eta \phi a \nu \iota a \nu$, and some suggest that $\delta \dot{\epsilon} \delta o \iota \kappa a$ ended the previous hexameter. "I fear their love of money and their arrogance." West agrees that the general thought was present in the poem, but not in this form.

5 Aristotle, Constitution of Athens

But Solon opposed both sides, and while he could have joined with whichever side he wished and become tyrant, he chose to incur the enmity of both by saving his homeland and legislating for the best. Everyone else agrees that he acted in this way and he himself in his poetry has made mention of this, as follows:

I have given the masses as much privilege as is sufficient, neither taking away from their honour nor adding to it. And as for those who had power and were envied for their wealth, I saw to it that they too should suffer no indignity. I stood with a mighty shield cast round both sides and did not allow either to have an unjust victory.

Solon is said to have foretold the Athenians of the coming tyranny (i.e., Pisistratus) in elegiac verses:

From a cloud comes the force of snow and hail, thunder from a flash of lightning, from powerful men a city's destruction, and through ignorance the masses fall enslaved to a tyrant. If they raise a man too high, it's not easy to restrain him afterwards; it is now that one should consider everything.

10 Diogenes Laertius, Lives of the Philosophers

Rushing into the assembly armed with spear and shield, he warned them of the designs of Pisistratus . . . And the council, consisting of Pisistratus' supporters, declared that he was mad; as a result of which he uttered these verses:

And afterwards, when Pisistratus was tyrant, he said:

If you have suffered grief because of your wrong action, do not lay the blame for this on the gods. You yourselves increased the power of these men by providing a bodyguard and that is why you have foul slavery. Each one of you follows the fox's tracks, and collectively you are empty-headed. You look to the tongue and words of a crafty man, but not to what he does.

12 Plutarch, Life of Solon

The sea is disturbed by winds, but if none moves it, it is the evenest¹ of all things.

Resplendent daughters of Memory and Olympian Zeus, Pierian¹ Muses, hearken to my prayer. Grant that I have prosperity from the blessed gods and a good reputation always from all men; grant that in these circumstances I be sweet to my friends and bitter to my enemies, viewed with respect by the former and with dread by the latter.

I long to have money, but I am unwilling to possess it unjustly, for retribution assuredly comes afterwards. Wealth which the gods give remains with a man, secure from the lowest foundation to the top,2 whereas wealth which men honour with violence comes in disorder, an unwilling attendant persuaded by unjust actions, and it is quickly mixed with ruin. Ruin has a small beginning, like that of fire, insignificant at first but grievous in the end, for mortals' deeds of violence do not live long. Zeus oversees every outcome, and suddenly, just as the clouds are quickly scattered by a spring wind which stirs up the bottom of the swelling and undraining(?) sea, ravages the lovely fields over the wheat-bearing land, reaches the gods' high seat in heaven, and again brings a clear sky to view; the strong sun shines in beauty over the fertile land and no longer can even a single cloud be seen-such is the vengeance of Zeus. He is not, like a mortal man, quick to anger at every incident, but anyone who has a sinful heart never ever escapes his notice and in the end he is assuredly revealed. But one man pays the penalty at once, another later, and if they themselves escape the penalty and the pursuing destiny of the gods does not overtake them, it assuredly comes at another time; the innocent pay the penalty, either their children or a later progeny. And thus we mortals, whatever our estate, think that the expectation which each one has is progressing well(?), until he suffers some mishap, and then afterwards he wails. But until then we take eager delight in empty hopes. Whoever is oppressed by grievous sickness thinks that he will be healthy; another man of low estate considers that it's high and that he's handsome, though his form is without beauty. If someone is lacking means and is constrained by the effects of poverty, he thinks that he will assuredly acquire much money. Everyone has a different pursuit. One roams over the fish-filled sea in ships, longing to bring home profit; tossed by cruel winds, he has no regard for life. Another, whose concern is the curved plough, cleaves the thickly wooded land and slaves away for a year. Another who has learned the works of Athena and Hephaestus,3 the god of many crafts, gathers in his livelihood with his hands; another, taught the gifts that come from the Olympian Muses and knowing the rules of the lovely art of poetry, makes his living. Another has been made a seer by lord Apollo who works from afar and, if the gods are with him, he sees a distant calamity coming upon a man; but assuredly neither augury nor sacrifice will ward off what is destined. Others, engaged in the work of Paeon,4 rich in drugs, are physicians; for them too there is no guarantee. Often agony results from a slight pain and no one can provide relief by giving soothing drugs, whereas another, in the throes of a terrible and grievous disease, he quickly restores to health with the touch of his hands. Fate brings good and ill to mortals and the gifts of the immortal gods are inescapable. In all actions there is risk and no one knows, when something starts, how it is going to turn out. The man who tries to act rightly falls unawares into great and harsh calamity, while to the one who acts badly the god gives success in all things, an escape from his folly. But of wealth no limit lies revealed to men, since those of us who now have the greatest livelihood show twice as much zeal. What could satisfy everyone? In truth the immortals give men profit, but from it (them?)5 there is revealed ruin, which

 1 Hesiod (Theog. 53) states that the Muses were born in Pieria, in southern Macedonia northwest of Mt. Olympus. 2 Various metaphors have been postulated (building, tree, grain, storage jar), but nothing specific need be intended. 3 Patron deities of craftsmen, especially potters. They shared cult worship in Athens. 4 The god of healing, often identified with Apollo. 5 The reference of $\alpha \dot{\nu} \tau \hat{\omega} \nu$ is unclear, some arguing for 'profit' (assuming this to mean unjustly gained), others for 'men' (i.e., men themselves are the cause of their own ruin), and others for 'immortals.'

15 Plutarch, Life of Solon

That he classified himself among the poor rather than the rich is clear from the following:

Many base men are rich and many good men poor: but we will not take their wealth in exchange for virtue, since this is always secure, while wealth belongs now to one man, now to another.

16 Clement of Alexandria, Miscellanies

Solon has written these very wise words about God:

Wisdom's hidden essence, which alone holds the key to everything, is the most difficult to discern.¹

¹ Clement may have misunderstood or misinterpreted Solon's words, since the context is probably political, with 'wisdom' being a requirement of good government.

17 Clement of Alexandria, Miscellanies

But Hesiod in his writings agrees with what has been said earlier . . . It is reasonable then that Solon the Athenian, following Hesiod, writes in his elegies:

The mind of the immortals is altogether hidden from men.

18 Pseudo-Plato, Lovers

What else is philosophizing than the statement of Solon? For he said:

As I grow old I am always learning many things.1

 $^{\mathrm{1}}$ This became proverbial and is cited in a great many sources.

19 Plutarch, Life of Solon

Then he sailed (from Egypt) to Cyprus and received an exceptionally warm welcome from Philocyprus, one of the local kings, who had a small city . . . Solon persuaded him to move the city to the lovely plain that lay below and to make it more attractive and spacious, and he took personal charge of the consolidation . . . Solon himself mentions this in the elegiac verses which he addressed to Philocyprus:

νῦν δὲ (φησί) σὰ μὲν Σολίοισι πολὰν χρόνον ἐνθάδ' ἀνάσσων τήνδε πόλιν ναίοις καὶ γένος ὑμέτερον· αὐτὰρ ἐμὲ ξὰν νηὰ θοῆ κλεινῆς ἀπὸ νήσου ἀσκηθῆ πέμποι Κύπρις ἰοστέφανος· οἰκισμῷ δ' ἐπὶ τῷδε χάριν καὶ κῦδος ὀπάζοι ἐσθλὸν καὶ νόστον πατρίδ' ἐς ἡμετέρην.

Now may you and your progeny dwell in this city and rule over Soloi¹ for a long time; and may Cypris of the violet crown send me unscathed from your famous island on a swift ship. May she bestow favour and glory on this settlement and a fair return to my homeland.

22a Proclus on Plato, Timaeus

The history of Solon's family and of Plato's kinship with him is as follows: Solon and Dropides were the sons of Execestides, and the son of Dropides was Critias, whom Solon mentions in his poetry, saying:

Or does each group love these things, without these things loving them?—thereby giving the lie to the poet who said:

Happy is he who has dear boys, horses of uncloven hoof, hunting dogs, and a friend in foreign parts.

 1 Or "dear sons," but a pederastic sense seems more probable. Plato has sophistically misrepresented Solon as applying $\phi i\lambda \omega \iota$ (with active meaning, 'loving') to the following nouns as well. Only Hermias names Solon as author.

25 Plutarch, Dialogue on Love

You did well, he said, to mention Solon, and we ought to use him as an index of the erotic man:

until (so long as?) one falls in love with a boy in the lovely flower of youth, desiring thighs and a sweet mouth.

26 Plutarch, Dialogue on Love

Hence I think Solon wrote those verses (fr. 25) while he was still young and "full of abundant seed," as Plato puts it, but the following when he was old:

But now the works of the Cyprus-born¹ and of Dionysus and the Muses are dear to me; they bring men good cheer,

27 Philo, On the Creation of the World

Solon, the Athenian lawgiver, described these ages of life in the following elegy:

A boy, while still an immature child, in seven years grows a fence of teeth and loses them for the first time. When the god completes another seven years, he shows the signs of coming puberty. In the third hebdomad his body is still growing, his chin becomes downy, and the skin changes its hue. In the fourth everyone is far the best in strength, whereby men show their signs of manliness. In the fifth it is time for a man to be mindful of marriage and to look for a line of sons to come after him. In the sixth a man's mind is being trained for everything and he is no longer as willing to commit acts of foolishness. In the seventh and eighth, a total of fourteen years, he is far the best in thought and speech. In the ninth he still has ability, but his speech and wisdom give weaker proof of a high level of excellence. If one

And regarding the ridicule which many heaped upon him for shunning tyranny, he has written as follows:

"Solon is by nature a man of shallow mind and a fool. When the god offered him good things, he did not accept them. He cast a great net round his quarry, but stood in wonderment and did not draw it tight, bereft of courage and sense alike. If I had gained power, obtained vast wealth, and become tyrant of Athens for only a single day, I'd be willing to be flayed into a wineskin afterwards and to have my line wiped out."

This is what he represented many of the common sort as saying about him.

And again in another place he speaks of those who wanted a redistribution of the land:

And others¹ came for plunder; they had hopes of wealth, each one of them thinking that he would find much prosperity and that I, for all my gentle prattle, would reveal a harsh disposition. They had foolish thoughts then, and now they are angry and they all look askance at me as if I were their enemy. They should not. With the help of the gods I have accomplished what I said I would, and other fruitless measures I did not take; it gives me no pleasure to act(?) with the violence of tyranny or to share the country's rich land equally between the lower and upper classes.²

Before achieving what of the goals for which I brought the people together² did I stop? In the verdict of time I will have as my best witness the mighty mother of the Olympian gods, dark Earth, whose boundary markers3 fixed in many places I once removed: enslaved before, now she is free. And I brought back to Athens, to their homeland founded by the gods, many who had been sold, one legally another not, and those who had fled under necessity's constraint, no longer speaking the Attic tongue, as wanderers far and wide are inclined to do. And those who suffered shameful slavery right here, trembling before the whims of their masters, I set free. These things I did by the exercise of my power, blending together force and justice, and I persevered to the end as I promised. I wrote laws for the lower and upper classes alike, providing a straight legal process for each person. If another had taken up the goad as I did, a man who gave bad counsel and was greedy, he would not have restrained the masses. For if I had been willing to do what then was pleasing to their opponents and in turn whatever the others [i.e., the masses] planned for them, this city would have been bereft of many men. A literal translation of seisachtheia. The term was given to Solon's cancellation of debts and according to Plutarch (Solon 15.2) it was a euphemism actually coined by Solon.
 Precise meaning disputed.
 As a sign of mortgaged land.

And again rebuking both sides for the complaints they made afterwards:

If I must rebuke the masses openly, their eyes would never have seen in their dreams what they now have . . . And those who are greater and stronger would praise me and treat me as their friend.

For if someone else, he says, had obtained this office, he would not have restrained the masses nor would he have stopped until he had stirred up the milk and got rid of the cream.¹ But I stood in no-man's-land² between them like a boundary marker.

 1 Meaning and syntax disputed. My translation assumes that milk = the state and cream = the aristocracy, but perhaps preferable is "until he had stirred up the masses and removed the cream from the milk," although the general meaning remains the same. See T. C. W. Stinton, JHS 96 (1976) 159-62. 2 A military metaphor, here perhaps standing for Athens itself.

Solon says in his iambics that gouros is a kind of cake:

They are drinking; and some are eating cakes, to thers bread, and others gouroi mixed with lentils. No pastry which the dark earth brings forth among mankind is lacking there, but everything is present in abundance.

¹ Athenaeus goes on (646d) to define itrion as a thin cake made with sesame and honey. The word gouros is not attested elsewhere.

39 Pollux, Vocabulary

They call mortar igdis, as does Solon in his iambics:

Some are hurrying for a mortar, others for silphium, and others for vinegar.¹

¹ It is unclear what kind of situation is being described here. Silphium is a plant whose juice was used as a medicine and as a pungent food flavouring. In the latter sense it goes well enough with vinegar, but neither seems an appropriate combination with mortar. There is some evidence that igdis could also be a type of dance and perhaps Pollux misunderstood Solon's meaning. Some assume that frr. 38-41 came from the same poem.

40 Phrynichus, Attic Words and Phrases

Even to this day the majority rightly call the pomegranate seed $kokk\bar{o}n$. In fact Solon uses it thus in his poetry:

are scattered foul and pederastic poems and other verses on which the virtuous life turns its back.⁶

1 See testt. 2-4. ² Other sources give the 58th or 57th Olympiad (p. 57 Garzya). ³ Nothing is known of this poem and some attribute it to the tragic poet Theognis whom the Suda goes on to record as one of the 30 tyrants. ⁴ Roughly double the size of the present corpus and perhaps "a mistake in the reckoning occasioned by the addition of two totals found in different sources" (Hudson-Williams 101). ⁵ It is unclear whether these and the maxims addressed to Cyrnus are being represented as separate works or as parts of the 2800. ⁶ These were collected in Book II, although the segregation actually occurred before the date of the Suda, since MSA, which alone preserves Book II, is earlier than the compilation of the Suda (2nd half of the 10th cent.).

2 Plato, Laws

But brave though these men are, we still say that even much braver are those who are conspicuously brave in the greatest of wars. And we also have as witness a poet, Theognis, a citizen of the Megarians in Sicily, who says (vv. 77-78).

I See test. 3.

3 Scholiast on the passage

There was much controversy among the ancients concerning Theognis and this information about him. Some say that he was from Attic Megara (this is the view of Didymus who attacks Plato for giving false information), while others say that he was from Sicily. Even if he were not from Sicily, the present passage does not mistreat him, but does τοὐναντίον· οὐ γὰρ ὑπὲρ 'Αττικοῦ ὡς 'Αθηναῖος λέγει, ἀλλὰ καίτοι πρὸς 'Αθηναῖον αὐτὸν παραβάλλων τὸν Τυρταῖον, τὸ ἀληθὲς περὶ τὴν κρίσιν ἐφύλαξεν καὶ τὸν Θέογνιν καὶ ξένον ὄντα προέκρινεν. τί δὲ ἐκώλυεν αὐτὸν ἐκ ταύτης μὲν εἶναι τῆς Μεγαρίδος, ἀπελθόντα δὲ εἰς Σικελίαν, ὡς ἱστορία ἔχει, γενέσθαι νόμῳ Μεγαρέα ἐκεῖ, ὡς καὶ τὸν Τυρταῖον Λακεδαιμόνιον;

4 Harpocration (pp. 126-27 Keaney)

the opposite. For Plato is not speaking as an Athenian on behalf of an Athenian, but although comparing him with an Athenian, Tyrtaeus, he kept to the truth in judging them and preferred Theognis even though a foreigner. What prevented his being from this Megara and after going to Sicily, as Plato's account implies, becoming a Megarian there according to the law, just as Tyrtaeus became a Spartan?

¹ The scholiast interprets Plato to mean that just as Tyrtaeus was an Athenian by birth but became a Spartan (see Tyrt. test. 2), so Theognis was from Megara on the Isthmus of Corinth but became a citizen of Megara's colony (Hyblaean Megara) in Sicily. This interpretation of Plato's words may be correct, but there is no evidence in the corpus that Theognis was a citizen of Hyblaean Megara and the modern consensus is that he came from mainland Megara. See also test. 4.

4 Harpocration, Lexicon of the Ten Attic Orators

Theognis was a Megarian from Attic Megara. The poet says this himself (v. 783). Plato did not pay attention to this when he said in Book 1 of the Laws that Theognis was a citizen of Megara in Sicily. And many have followed Plato.

5 Isocrates, To Nicocles

Moreover this too was clear to me, that although all consider words of advice both in poetry and in prose to be most useful, they certainly do not derive the greatest pleasure from listening to them, but their attitude towards them is the same as their attitude towards those who admonish; for although they praise the latter, they prefer to associate with those who share in their follies and not with those who seek to dissuade them. As proof one could cite the poetry of Hesiod, Theognis, and Phocylides;¹ for people say that these have been the best advisers for human life, but while saying this they prefer to occupy themselves with one another's follies than with the precepts of those poets. And furthermore, if one were to select from the foremost poets those maxims, as they are called, to which they had given their most serious attention, people would treat these in the same way too; for they would more gladly listen to the most paltry comedy than to such proficient compositions.

6 Stobaeus, Anthology

From Xenophon's¹ work on Theognis. "They are the verses of Theognis of Megara" (22-23). This poet's composition is about nothing else than human excellence and vice, and his poetry is a treatise on people, just as if a horseman were to write about horsemanship. And so the primary element² of his poetry seems to me to be correct, since it is about good birth. For he believed that neither a person nor anything else could be good unless the progenitors were good. He therefore decided to use as examples other living creatures which are not raised at random, but which are systematically attended to in each case so that they will be of the best descent. He makes this clear in his verses (183-90). These verses mean that people do not know how to procreate from one another and as a result the human race is becoming worse because the worse is ever mingled with the better. But many think on the basis of these verses that the poet is leveling accusations against human greed and against those who know how to make money compensate for low birth and vice.³ But it seems to me that he is accusing them of lack of knowledge about their own lives.

 1 There is much debate about whether this is the well-known Athenian writer born c. 430 B.C. or some unknown figure. The only other reference to a work on Theognis is the two books recorded by Diogenes Laertius 6.16 in his list of Antisthenes' writings. 2 Since $\mathring{a}\rho\chi\acute{\eta}$ can also mean 'beginning,' some argue that the edition of Theognis used by Xenophon began with the verses cited below (183-90). 3 This sentence is ungrammatical and presumably has suffered corruption. I have translated what seems to be the general sense.

unnoticed, nor will anyone take something worse in exchange when that which is good is at hand, but everyone will say, "They are the verses of Theognis of Megara, and he is famous among all men;"4 but I am not yet able to please all the townsmen. It's not surprising, Polypaïdes, since not even Zeus pleases everyone when he sends rain or holds back.⁵ It is with kind thoughts for you that I shall give you advice such as I myself, Cyrnus, learned from noble men while still a child. Be sensible and do not, at the cost of shameful or unjust acts, seize for yourself prestige, success or wealth. Know that this is so, and do not seek the company of base men, but always cling to the noble.6 Drink and dine with them, sit with them, and be pleasing to those whose power is great. For from the noble you will learn noble things, but if you mingle with the base, you will lose even the sense you have. Knowing this, associate with the noble, and one day you will say that I give good advice to my friends.

¹ There is no agreement whether these verses represent one poem, two poems (19-30, 31-38) or three (19-26, 27-30, 31-38). On this, and also on Theognis' date, see H. The name, together with the patronymic (v. 25), appears numerous times in the corpus. ⁴ Many end the quotation with the word Megara. ⁵ Cf. vv. 801-4. ⁶ The words ἀγαθός/ἐσθλός and κακός/ δειλός occur frequently in the corpus as an indication of social sta-

Cyrnus, this city is pregnant and I am afraid she will give birth to a man who will set right² our wicked insolence. These townsmen are still of sound mind, but their leaders³ have changed and fallen into the depths of depravity. Never yet, Cyrnus, have noble men destroyed a city, but whenever the base take delight in outrageous behaviour and ruin the people and give judgements in favour of the unjust, for the sake of their own profit and power, do not expect that city to remain quiet long, even if it is now utterly calm, whenever this is dear to base men, profit that comes along with public harm.⁴ From this arise civil strife, the spilling of kindred blood, and tyrants; may this city never delight in that.

¹ Treated by some as two poems (39-42, 43-52). Vv. 39-42 reappear as 1081-82b, with a difference between only 40 and 1082.

⁴ The punctuation of vv. 43-50 is disputed, depending in part on whether the subjunctive or indicative is read in v. 45. I have followed West, but with no great confidence.

² I.e., a tyrant (cf. v. 52). The only tyrant of Megara we know of was Theagenes, whose rule ended c. 600, but Theognis may well be afraid that another tyrant will arise.

³ Presumably the ruling oligarchs, members of the aristocracy, but since they do not behave as 'noble' men should, they can be called 'base' (vv. 44, 49).

Cyrnus, this city is still a city, but the people are different, people who formerly knew neither justice nor laws, but wore tattered goatskins about their sides and lived outside this city like deer. And now they are noble, Polypaïdes, while those who were noble before are now base. Who can endure the sight of this? They deceive one another and mock one another, knowing neither the distinctive marks of the base nor those of the noble.2 Make none of these townsmen your sincere friend, Polypaïdes, because of any need. Seem in speech to be the friend of everyone, but share with no one any serious matter whatsoever. If you do, you will come to know the minds of men who are wretched, since there is no trust to be placed in their actions, but they love treachery, deceit, and craftiness, just like men beyond salvation.

 1 Some divide into two poems (53-60, 61-68). 2 Vv. 57-60 recur, with some variation, in 1109-10 and 1113-14. West agrees with Schneidewin that 1111-12 should be inserted after 58.

If a man praises you as long as you can see him, but speaks maliciously when apart, such a comrade is in truth no very good friend, whoever speaks with a smooth tongue but has different thoughts. May I have the sort of friend who knows his comrade and, like a brother, puts up with his disposition even when he is hard to bear. Please take these things to heart, my friend, and one day hereafter you will remember me.

¹ Editors regularly treat these verses as a single poem, but West may well be right to divide them into three (93-94, 95-96, 97-100), with a lacuna after 94. 97-100 reappear as 1164a-d.

Let no one persuade you, Cyrnus, to make a base man your friend. Of what use is a base man as a friend? He would not rescue you from hard toil or from ruin (delusion?) nor if he has any success would he be willing to give you a share of this. Doing a good turn to the base is an utterly useless act of kindness; it is the same as sowing the expanse of the white-capped sea. You cannot reap a tall crop by sowing the sea and you cannot get anything good in return by doing good to the base. For the base have an insatiable desire; if you make one mistake, the friendship shown by all former acts is wasted. But the noble enjoy to the highest degree the treatment they've received, they remember the good things, and they are grateful thereafter.

¹ Most editors treat 101-4 and 105-12 as separate poems.

Never make a base man your close comrade, but always avoid him like a bad harbour.

Many in truth are your comrades when there's food and drink, but not so many when the enterprise is serious.

Nothing, Cyrnus, is more difficult to recognize than a counterfeit man and nothing is of more importance than being on one's guard against him.

The ruin that results from counterfeit gold and silver is endurable, Cyrnus, and it is easy for an expert to find out (that they are counterfeit). But if a friend's intent is false and lies undetected in his breast and if he has a treacherous heart, this is the most counterfeit thing that the god has made for mortals and to recognize it costs the greatest pain of all. For you cannot know a man's or a woman's intent, until you make trial of it like a beast of burden, nor can you form an estimate of it by coming as it were at the right time(?), since appearances often deceive one's judgement.

There is nothing among mankind better than a father and a mother, Cyrnus, who care about holy justice.

133-42

No one, Cyrnus, is responsible on his own for ruin or profit, but it is the gods who give both. Nor does anyone know in his heart whether his toil will turn out well or badly in the end. For often a man who thought he would fail succeeds and a man who thought he would succeed fails. No one has at hand everything he wants, since the constraints of grievous helplessness hold him back. We mortals have vain thoughts, not knowledge; it is the gods who bring everything to pass according to their own intent.

¹ This proverbial statement is also attributed to Phocylides (fr. 10).

149-50

Fortune gives even an utterly wicked man riches, Cyrnus, but excellence is allotted to few as their companion.

151-52

It is insolence, Cyrnus, that the god gives first to a wicked man whose position he intends to make of no account.

153-54

In truth excess breeds insolence, whenever prosperity comes to a wicked man who is not sound of mind.¹

161-64

Many indeed have worthless brains, but enjoy good fortune, and for them apparent failure turns into success. And there are those who labour wisely, but suffer bad luck, and their efforts accomplish nothing.

165-66

No man is prosperous or poor or of low or high estate¹ without divine aid.

Poverty, Cyrnus, overwhelms a man of worth more than anything else, including hoary age and fever. To escape from it, Cyrnus, you should throw yourself to the monsters of the sea or down from lofty cliffs. For in effect a man overwhelmed by poverty is powerless to say or accomplish anything, and his tongue is bound fast.

179-80

One should search over land and the broad-backed sea alike, Cyrnus, to find a release from grievous poverty.

181-82

It is better, dear Cyrnus, for a poor man to be dead than to live oppressed by grievous poverty.

183-92

We seek out rams and asses and horses that are purebred, Cyrnus, and everyone wishes that they mount (females) of good stock; but a noble man does not mind marrying the base daughter of a base father if the latter gives him a lot of money, and a woman does not refuse to be the wife of a base man who is rich, but she wants a wealthy man instead of one who is noble. It is money people honour; one who is noble marries the daughter of one who is base and one who is base marries the daughter of one who is noble. Wealth has mixed up blood. And so, Polypaïdes, do not be surprised that the townsmen's stock is becoming enfeebled, since what is noble is mixing with what is base.

Whatever possession comes to a man from Zeus and is obtained with justice and without stain, is forever lasting. But if a man acquires it unjustly, inopportunely, and with a greedy heart or seizes it wrongly by a false oath, for the moment he thinks he's winning profit, but in the end it turns out badly and the will of the gods prevails. The minds of men, however, are misled, since the blessed gods do not punish sin at the time of the very act, but one man pays his evil debt himself and doesn't cause doom to hang over his dear progeny later, while another is not overtaken by justice; before that ruthless death settles on his eyelids, bringing doom.¹

We cannot regard ourselves as men who are saved, Cyrnus, but as a city that will be utterly captured.¹

¹ Probably not in the literal sense, but as a city that will be 'taken over' by those who are, in Theognis' view, members of the lower class. It is also possible that the verb has its legal meaning, 'condemned.'

I have given you wings with which you will fly, soaring easily, over the boundless sea and all the land. You will be present at every dinner and feast, lying on the lips of many, and lovely youths accompanied by the clear sounds of pipes2 will sing of you in orderly fashion with beautiful, clear voices. And whenever you go to Hades' house of wailing, down in the dark earth's depths, never even in death will you lose your fame, but you will be in men's thoughts, your name ever immortal, Cyrnus, as you roam throughout the land of Greece and among the islands, crossing over the fish-filled, undraining(?) sea, not riding on the backs of horses,3 but it is the splendid gifts of the violet-wreathed Muses that will escort you. For all who care about their gifts, even for future generations, you will be alike the subject of song, as long as earth and sun exist. And yet I do not meet with a slight4 respect from you, but you deceive me with your words, as if I were a small child.

¹ These verses seem to form a kind of epilogue to 19-26, although they need not have been composed for that purpose.
² The Greek word is a diminutive, apparently describing a pipe suitable for young voices.
³ The significance of this is disputed.
⁴ A few prefer to connect the negative with the adjective, "I meet with no slight respect," i.e., "with much respect," arguing that Cyrnus shows considerable respect, but it is not genuine, as the next verse indicates.

Fairest is that which is most just, best is health, and the most pleasurable thing is to obtain what one loves.²

² Not necessarily in an erotic sense.

257-60

I am a fine, prize-winning horse, but I carry a man who is utterly base, and this causes me the greatest pain. Often I was on the point of breaking the bit, throwing my bad rider, and running off.¹

¹ Various explanations of the imagery have been offered. The likeliest, in my opinion, is that the horse represents a woman of the upper class married off to a man of the lower class, and resenting the union.

261-66

No wine is being drunk for me (?), since at the tender maiden's side another man, much inferior to me, has the upper hand. Poverty is indeed well known, even though she belongs to someone else. She does not visit the marketplace or the courts, since everywhere her status is inferior, everywhere she is scorned, and everywhere she is equally hated, regardless of where she is.

The gods have given mortal men an equal share of other things, accursed old age and youth, but there is something that is the worst and most grievous of all things in human life, including death and every kind of sickness, (namely, that) whenever you have raised sons, provided everything that is fitting, and stored up wealth (for them) after much bitter suffering, they hate their father, pray for his death, and loathe him as if he were a beggar at the door.¹

Dear Zeus, I'm surprised at you. You are lord over all, you alone have great power and prestige, you know well the mind and heart of every man, and your rule, king, is the highest of all. How then, son of Cronus, does your mind bear to hold sinners and the just man in the same esteem, whether the mind of men is disposed to prudent discretion or to wanton outrage, when they yield to unjust acts? Have no rules been set by divinity for mortals, is there no path along which one can go and please the immortals? [Some people rob and steal quite shamelessly, 2 but for all that they have a prosperity free from harm, while others who refrain from wicked deeds nevertheless get poverty, the mother of helplessness, despite their love of justice, poverty which leads men's hearts astray to sinful action, impairing their wits under the force of necessity. Against his will a man brings himself to endure much that is shameful. yielding to need which teaches many bad ways, including lies, deceit, and deadly strife, even though he is unwilling. There is no ill comparable to need, for it gives birth to painful helplessness. In poverty, whenever need takes hold, both the base man and he who is much better are brought to light. For the latter's mind has its thoughts on justice and straight judgement is ever implanted in his breast, while the former's mind does not go along with either bad times or good.³ The noble man must bring himself to endure both, to respect his friends, and to shun false oaths that bring ruin to men. . . . carefully, avoiding the wrath of the immortals.

¹ Editors regularly divide into two or more segments (usually 373-92, 393-400 or 373-80, 381-82, 383-92, 393-400), but I agree with West (Studies 153-54) that it is best to assume one poem with two lacunae.
² West's suggestion for the contents of the lacuna.
³ It is difficult to obtain adequate sense from ἔπεται, 'follow' or 'accompany,' and there may well be textual corruption, but perhaps the meaning is that the base man cannot accommodate himself to either bad or good fortune.

401-406

Don't show too much zeal.¹ Proper measure is best in all men's actions.² Often a man is zealous of merit, seeking gain, a man whom divinity on purpose leads astray into great wickedness, and easily makes what is bad seem to him to be good, and what is worthwhile seem to be bad.

¹ This pessimistic outlook appears in many authors and became proverbial. Only some of the sources name Theognis as the author. Since a number cite only the hexameters and since the pentameters add nothing new, it can be safely assumed that the poet has formed an elegy out of two pre-existing hexameters.

It is easier to beget and rear a man than to put good sense in him. No one has yet devised a means whereby one has made the fool wise and a noble man out of one who is base. If the god had granted this power to the Asclepiads, to cure men's baseness and muddled wits, they would be earning many a handsome fee. And if good sense could be made and placed in a man, there would never be a base son of a noble father, since he would heed words of wisdom. But you will never make the base man noble through teaching.

one who's wide awake to sleep against his will. All force is disagreeable. And let (a slave) stand by and pour wine for him who wants to drink; it's not possible to have a good time every night. But I'll go home—I've had my limit of honey-sweet wine and I'll take thought for sleep that brings release from ills. I've reached the stage where the consumption of wine is most pleasant for a man, since I am neither sober nor too drunk. Whoever exceeds his limit of drink is no longer in command of his tongue or his mind; he says wild things which are disgraceful in the eyes of the sober, and he's not ashamed of anything he does when he's drunk. Formerly he was sensible, but then he's a fool. Aware of this, don't drink wine to excess, but either rise before you're drunk—don't let your belly overpower you as if you were a wretched hired help for the day-or stay without drinking. But you say "fill it up!" This is always your idle chatter; that's why you get drunk. One cup is a toast to friendship, another is set before you, another you offer as a libation to the gods, another you have as a penalty,2 and you don't know how to say no. That man is truly the champion who after drinking many cups will say nothing foolish. If you stay by the mixing bowl, make good conversation, long avoiding quarrels with one another and speaking openly³ to one and all alike. In this way a symposium turns out to be not half bad.

Wine drunk in large quantities is a bane, but if one drinks it wisely, it is not a bane but a blessing.¹

¹ A slightly different version occurs at 211-12. See West's edition for five additional sources and for variant readings, none of which alters the sense.

511-22

You've crossed the deep sea, Clearistus,¹ and come here penniless, poor fellow, to one who's penniless. But I'll provide the best of what there is, and if any friend of yours comes along, recline as suits your degree of friendship.² I'll not hold back anything of what I have nor bring in more from elsewhere to entertain you. I'll stow under the benches at the side of your ship, Clearistus, such as I have and the gods provide. And if anyone asks how I live, reply to him as follows: "Poorly by good standards, but quite well by poor standards,³ and so he doesn't fail one friend of the family, but is unable to offer entertainment to more."

¹ Identity unknown. ² For the significance of seating arrangements see Plato Symp. 222e. ³ More literally, "compared to one who lives well, he lives poorly, but compared to one who lives poorly, he lives quite well," $\zeta \hat{\eta}$ being understood from $\beta i \nu \nu$ with each adverb.

523-26

Not to no purpose, Wealth, do mortals honour you most of all, for you easily put up with baseness.¹ In fact, it is fitting for the noble to have wealth, whereas poverty is appropriate for the base man to endure.

¹ The poet seems to be saying sarcastically that Wealth is honoured because he does not mind conferring his benefits on the base. The second couplet then provides a correction. The majority of editors treat the couplets as separate.

527-28

Alas for youth and alas for cursed old age, the latter because it comes on, the former because it leaves.

529-30

I have not betrayed any friend or loyal comrade, and there's nothing of the slave¹ in my soul.

 $^{\rm 1}$ The poet means that a slave would feel no obligation to be loyal.

531-34

My heart is always warmed whenever I hear the pipes sounding a lovely voice. I delight in drinking well and singing to the piper's accompaniment, and I delight in holding in my hands the tuneful lyre.¹

535-38

Never is a slave's head by nature straight, but it is always crooked, and he holds his neck aslant. For from a squill grow neither roses nor hyacinth and the child of a slave mother is never free in spirit.

539-40

This man, dear Cyrnus, is forging fetters for himself, unless the gods deceive my judgement.¹

¹ West suggests that the couplet was preceded by 1101-1102.

541-42

I'm afraid, Polypaïdes, that lawlessness will destroy this city, 1 just as it did the Centaurs, eaters of raw flesh. 2

 1 Cf. 1103-1104. $^{\,2}$ Not a normal attribute of the Centaurs, but it is said of the Centaur Pholus in Apollodorus 2.5.4.

543-46

I must render this judgement by rule and square, Cyrnus, and give an equal share to both sides, with the aid of seers, auguries, and burning sacrifices, so that I not incur the shameful reproach of having erred.¹

¹ Some editors treat the couplets as separate (the second being incomplete) and some assume a lacuna after 544.

557 κίνδυνός codd., κληρός tentavit West (δ' ὁ om. o) 559 λωιστά σε Geel (plene interpungens post 558)

¹ Text and translation highly uncertain. See West, Studies 156. Except for West, editors treat 555-56, which are almost identical to 1178ab, as a separate couplet, and some assume three separate couplets.

547-48

Don't at all apply force on anyone by base means; nothing is better for the just man than a kindly act.¹

549-54

The voiceless messenger,¹ shining from the fargleaming lookout, is rousing tearful war, Cyrnus. Come, place bits on the swift-heeled horses, for I think they'll meet the enemy. The distance between is not great; they'll get there,² unless the gods deceive my judgement.

¹ A beacon fire. ² West (Studies 156) considers this "inane" and prefers the dative $\delta\iota a\pi\rho\dot{\eta}\sigma\sigma\sigma\upsilon\sigma\iota$, "I think they will meet the foe—the distance is not far—already on the way," but the presence of both genitive and dative with $\dot{a}\nu\tau\iota\dot{a}\sigma\epsilon\iota\nu$ in the same sentence is intolerably harsh, even though both constructions are found. West, following Hudson-Williams, treats 554 as inserted from 540 to replace a lost verse, and this is highly probable.

555-60

The man laid low in painful hardships must endure and ask the immortal gods for release. Take heed—your estate is balanced on a razor's edge; at one time you will have much, at another less—so as not to become exceedingly rich in possessions nor to enter into great poverty.¹

571-72

(Mere) reputation is a great evil for men; trial is best. Many who have not been tested have a reputation for merit.¹

573-74

Experience good by doing good. Why would you send another messenger? News of a good deed travels easily.

575-76

It's my friends who betray me, for I avoid my enemy just as the helmsman avoids reefs in the sea.¹

577-78

"It is easier to make bad from good than good from bad." —Don't try to teach me; I'm too old to learn.1

 $^{\rm l}$ The pentameter seems to be a sarcastic reply to a well-known saying.

579-82

I hate a scoundrel and I veil myself as I pass by, with as little thought for him as a small bird would have.¹ And I hate a woman who runs around, and a lecher who wants to plough a field belonging to another.²

¹ Translation uncertain. With West's emendation the verse describes the man, "a creature with a small bird's empty brains," as he translates it. ² Some editors treat the couplets as separate and some combine them with 583-84. Attempts have been made to identify the speaker with figures from mythology or with a personification such as Tyche, Dike etc.

585-90

In truth, there is risk in every action and no one knows, when something starts, how it is going to turn out. The man who tries for a good reputation falls unawares into great and harsh calamity, while to the one who acts badly the god gives success in all things, an escape from his folly.¹

¹ A version of Solon fr. 13.65-70.

One must endure what the gods give mortal men and calmly bear both lots, 1 neither too sick at heart in bad times nor suddenly rejoicing 2 in good times, until the final outcome is seen.

 $^{\rm 1}$ I.e., good and bad for tune. $^{\rm 2}$ Literally, "and don't suddenly rejoice." For the synt ax see West, $\it Studies$ 156-57.

Let's be comrades at a distance, fellow. There is satiety in everything except for wealth. In fact, let's be friends for a long time, but associate with other men who have a better understanding of how you think.¹

Don't be too vexed at heart in hard times or rejoice too much in good times, since it is the mark of a noble man to endure everything. And you shouldn't swear, "this will never be," for the gods are resentful and the outcome depends on them. They act, what's more: good comes from bad and bad from good; a poor man suddenly gets very rich, and he who has acquired a great deal suddenly loses it all in one night; a sensible man errs, fame often accompanies the fool, and even a base man wins honour.

yond the Melian sea⁴ through the dark night, and they refuse to bail, even though the sea is washing over both sides. In very truth, safety is difficult for anyone, such things are they doing; they have deposed the noble helmsman⁵ who skilfully kept watch, they seize possessions by force, and discipline is lost; no longer is there an equal distribution in the common interest; the porters rule, and the base are above the noble. I'm afraid that perhaps a wave will swallow the ship. Let these be my riddling words with hidden meaning for the noble. But anyone, if he is wise, can recognize the actual calamity.⁶

¹ See n. 1 on 467-96. ² Text uncertain. Van Groningen's emendation is attractive, "although I knew one thing still better than many." ³ From 671 to 680 we have the imagery of the ship of state. A social and political revolution is underway and the nobility are apparently making little effort to avoid a total overthrow. ⁴ Melos is at the southwest edge of the Cyclades, beyond which is open sea. ⁵ Presumably the nobles who held power rather than an individual. ⁶ With Brunck's emendation, accepted by most, the meaning will be, "But even a base man, if he is clever, can recognize (the meaning of my riddling words)."

For the majority of people this alone is best: wealth. Nothing else after all is of use, not even if you have the good judgement of Rhadamanthys1 himself or know more than Sisyphus,² son of Aeolus, who by his wits came up even from Hades, after persuading with wily words Persephone who impairs the mind of mortals and brings them forgetfulness. No one else has ever yet contrived this, once death's dark cloud has enveloped him and he has come to the shadowy place of the dead and passed the black gates which hold back the souls of the dead, for all their protestations. But even from there the hero Sisyphus returned to the light of the sun by his cleverness.  1 Son of Zeus and Europa and one of the judges in the underworld. 2 He instructed his wife to neglect his burial rites after his death, so that he could use punishment of her as an excuse to be allowed to return to the upperworld. 3 The aged warrior from Pylos whose eloquence is praised in the Iliad (cf. esp. $1.247~\rm f.$). 4 Female wind spirits who snatch $(\dot{\alpha}\rho\pi\dot{\alpha}\zeta\omega)$ people away (cf. Od. 20.66-78). 5 Zetes and Calaïs, who are also wind spirits and are represented as winged (Pind. Pyth. 4.182 f.).

⁶ The precise meaning of the infinitive is disputed. Van Groningen argues for 'abandon,' but the last couplet seems to repeat rather than oppose the opening statement.

719 - 28

Equally rich is he who has much silver and gold, fields of wheat-bearing land, and horses and mules, and he who has at hand what is necessary to provide comfort for his stomach, sides, and feet, and the season for a boy and for a wife, whenever the season for this comes, accompanied by a youthful vigour that fits his needs. This is wealth for mortals, since no one goes to Hades with all his enormous possessions nor can he pay a price to escape death or grim diseases or the onset of evil old age.¹

Mankind's allotment is anxieties; they have wings of varied hue and they lament for life and livelihood.¹

Father Zeus, would that it pleased the gods that wanton outrage delighted sinners and that wicked deeds pleased the hearts of the gods, 1 but that whoever acted . . ., without regard for the gods, should then pay woeful requital in person, and the father's sins should no longer be a bane for his sons afterwards;2 and would that sons of an unjust father who act with just intent, dreading your anger, son of Cronus, and loving justice from the start in their dealings with fellow townsmen, should not pay for the transgressions of their fathers. May this be pleasing to the blessed gods. But now the perpetrator escapes and another then suffers misery. Also, king of the immortals, how is it right that a man who keeps from unjust deeds and does not commit transgressions and perjury, but is just, suffers unjustly? What other mortal, looking upon him, would then be in awe of the immortals? What frame of mind people may send you glorious hecatombs amid festivity, delighting in the lyre and in lovely feasting and in the dances of paeans³ and in cries round your altar. For indeed I am afraid when I look upon the mindless, people-destroying strife of the Greeks. Come, Phoebus, graciously protect this city of ours.⁴ For I went once to the land of Sicily and I went to the vine-rich plain of Euboea and to Sparta, the splendid city of the reed-nourishing Eurotas, and they all treated me with kindly friendship on my arrival. But no delight came to my heart from them, so true it is after all that nothing else is dearer than one's homeland.

There is no one on earth who escapes blame; but it is better thus, if the majority pay no heed.

I have suffered something that is not actually worse than ugly death, Cyrnus, but that is more bitter than anything else: my friends have betrayed me. I'll approach my enemies and see how they're disposed.

815-18

An ox steps on my tongue with his powerful foot,¹ Cyrnus, and prevents me from flattering, although I know how to. After all, it's impossible to escape from what one is destined to suffer; and I'm not at all afraid to suffer what it is my fate to suffer.²

A proverbial statement used of those who cannot speak freely. ² Except for West, editors treat the two couplets as separate. West deletes the last verse, attributing it to some Stoic editor, and this is a decided improvement.

819-20

Cyrnus, we have reached the terrible situation against which our prayers were often directed, a situation in which it would be best if our allotted death were to seize us both together.

Don't be led on by hopes of gain to increase a tyrant's power, and don't swear an oath by the gods to kill him.

825-30

How do you endure in your hearts to sing to the piper's accompaniment? From the marketplace there is visible the mortgage-marker of the land that feeds with its fruits those who wear crimson garlands on their blond hair at feasts. Come, Scythes, crop your hair, bring the revelry to an end, and grieve for the fragrant land that is being lost.

² There is much obscurity in these verses. B. Bravo, Annales Littéraires de l'Univ. de Besançon 429 (1990) 41-51, argues that Scythes (a man's name, not an ethnic designation) is holding an elaborate symposium in his house even though his land is mortgaged and that the poet is urging him to crop his hair in grief for the land he will soon lose. My translation reflects this interpretation, but this hinges on the problematic explanation of οὖρος, traditionally understood as the (diminished) boundary of the town's land.

Through trust I lost my possessions, through distrust I rescued them; awareness of both brings bitterness.

¹ The speaker is feminine, but beyond that there is no agreement. The many, often bizarre, attempts to explain the verses are surveyed by J. Labarbe in Serta Leodiensia Secunda (Liège 1992) 237-45, but his own identification of the speaker as an owl is no less bizarre. According to West (Studies 160), "the speaker is in the position of a beggar" and is the wife or daughter of the master of the house.

He who watches over his spending according to his means is held in the highest esteem by men of understanding. For if it were possible to see the end of life, how much one was destined to complete before passing into Hades, it would be reasonable for the man who expected a longer period of life to be more sparing, so that he might have livelihood. But as things are, it's impossible. Because of this I am greatly saddened, torn at heart, and of two minds. I'm standing at the crossroads, with two ways ahead of me, and deliberating which of them to choose, whether to spend nothing and wear away my life in misery or to live a life of pleasure, accomplishing little. For I have seen one who was sparing and though wealthy never gave his belly the food of a freeman, but he went down to the house of Hades before spending his money(?) and some chance person got his property; as a result he toiled to no purpose and did not give (his money) to whomever he wished. And I have seen another who gratifying his belly squandered his money, having delighted his heart with the eating of sweet food; he begs from all his friends, wherever he sees any. So, Democles, it is best of all to spend according to one's means and to be careful. For you won't give another the fruit of your labours after a life of toil nor will you be a beggar and endure slavery. Not even if you reach old age will all your means run out. In such a generation as this it's best to have money. For if you are wealthy, many are your friends, but few if you are poor, and you are no longer the same worthy man you once were.1

I will adorn my homeland, a shining city, neither turning it over to the populace nor giving in to unjust men.¹

¹ Some editors combine with the previous couplet and some assign them to Solon. Both language and thought are similar to passages in Solon.

949-54

Like a lion trusting in its might, I snatched a fawn from the doe with my claws, and did not drink its blood; I scaled the city's high walls, and did not sack it; I yoked a team, and did not mount the chariot; I have done, and not done; completed, and not completed; performed, and not performed; accomplished, and not accomplished.¹

¹ 949-50 also appear as 1278cd, where the compiler must have judged the imagery to be erotic, and some assume that the whole segment describes one who had the object of his affection within his control, but did nothing about it. The four verbs in 953-54 are essentially synonyms.

Never praise a man until you know clearly what he is in temperament, disposition, and way of life. Many indeed have a false, thievish character and keep it hidden, taking on an attitude appropriate to the day. But time assuredly reveals the character of each of them. I'll not find fault with any of my enemies whose behaviour is noble, nor will I praise a friend whose behaviour is base.

Cyrnus, this city is pregnant and I am afraid she will give birth to a man who commits wanton outrage, a leader of grievous strife. These townsmen are still of sound mind, but their leaders have changed and fallen into the depths of depravity.¹

Don't show affection for me in your words, but keep a different mind and heart, if you love me and the mind within you is loyal. But love me sincerely or renounce me, hate me, and quarrel openly. - ...; I, however, am under no obligation to do this. Be grateful for what I've done before.
- 1 West's text at the beginning ("Make a bid now for someone else") makes the couplet almost identical to 1095-96 and is based on the assumption that the opening "had become partly illegible through damp or some other cause" (Studies 163). The pronoun $\sigma o\iota$, however, is redundant with the middle and none of the attempts to correct the text is convincing.

The mind is a good thing and so is the tongue; but they are found in few men who have control over both.

1187-90

I heard the bird's¹ shrill cry, Polypaïdes, which comes to men as a messenger of the season for ploughing; and it struck my melancholy heart, since others possess my flowering fields and mules do not pull the curved plough for me . . . because of seafaring.²

¹ I.e., the crane. Cf. Hes. Opera 448-50. ² The last verse is judged corrupt by most and none of the many emendations is persuasive. It seems likely that Theognis has lost his land because of a disastrous sea voyage.

1203-1206

I shan't go and he won't be invited by me. ¹ A tyrant won't be mourned (by me) even at his tomb when he goes beneath the earth, any more than he would grieve or let warm tears fall from his eyes when I am dead.

¹ This seems to mean, 'I shall not go to his funeral nor will he be invited to mine.'

1207-1208

We neither exclude you from our revel nor do we invite you. You are welcome¹ when present and a friend when absent.

¹ If $\dot{a}\rho\gamma a\lambda \dot{\epsilon}os$ is retained, the meaning would be "you are troublesome" or "a nuisance," but this conflicts with 1207 which suggests that it is all the same whether the person joins in the revel or not.

1209-10

I am Aethon¹ by birth, but I dwell in the well-walled city of Thebes, excluded from my homeland.

 1 Presumably a fictitious name, but its significance is unknown. Since this is the name Odysseus takes on in Od. 19.183, an allusion to that passage is often assumed, but there too the significance is unclear. As an adjective it means 'fiery' in a variety of senses.

1211-16

Don't make silly jokes and mock my parents, Argyris. For you there is slavery, but for me, though I have many other woes, woman, because I am in exile from my land, there is no dreadful slavery nor am I for sale. Moreover, I have a city, a fair one that lies on the Lethaean plain. ²

¹ Identity unknown. The name would be appropriate for an hetaera.
² Lethaeus was a tributary of the Maeander river, but some see a reference to the river of the underworld, comparing "the plain of Lethe" (τὸ Λήθης πεδίον) in Arist. Frogs 186 and Plato Rep. 10.621a. Identification depends on how the poem as a whole is interpreted, and on this there is no agreement. See L. Kurke, ClAnt 16 (1997) 143-45.

1217-18

Let us never¹ laugh if we sit beside one who mourns, Cyrnus, rejoicing in our own good fortune.²

It is difficult for an enemy to deceive even an enemy, Cyrnus, but easy for a friend to deceive a friend.

1221-30

The first three couplets are preserved only in Stobaeus, the fourth in Athenaeus. Both sources assign them to Theognis. 1227-28 are omitted, since Mimnermus fr. 8 was wrongly inserted here.

1221-22

Speech¹ is apt to cause many a slip for mortal men, Cyrnus, when their judgement is in turmoil.

¹ Or "calculation." Because Stobaeus cites the couplet under the heading "On cowardice," some emend λόγος to a word for 'fear' (δέος, ϕ ό β ος), but the error may rest with Stobaeus or the context may have contained a reference to cowardice.

1223-24

There is nothing more unjust than anger, Cyrnus. It harms the one who possesses it, gratifying his base instincts.

1225-26

Nothing is sweeter than a good wife, Cyrnus. I testify to it; you testify to my truthfulness.¹

¹ It is unclear whether this means that Cyrnus is to marry a similar wife or to testify to the character of the poet's wife. Probably the former.

1231-1389

The remaining verses are preserved only in ms A, which assigns them to Book 2 ($\epsilon \lambda \epsilon \gamma \epsilon i \omega \nu \beta$). Many are erotic, with emphasis on the pederastic.

1231-34

Cruel Eros, the spirits of Madness took you up and nursed you. Because of you Troy's acropolis was destroyed, and great Theseus, Aegeus' son, and noble Ajax, Oïleus' son, through your acts of recklessness.¹

¹ Troy was destroyed because of Helen's elopement with Paris; Theseus probably because he accompanied Pirithous in an attempt to carry off Persephone (in some accounts he was imprisoned in Hades, in others he was set free by Heracles); and Ajax because of his rape of Cassandra (cf. Alcaeus fr. 298).

 1 Or "listen to me, boy, and gain control of your thoughts," i.e., "change your way of thinking"; but $\delta \alpha \mu \acute{\alpha} \zeta \omega$ is so common in erotic contexts that Vetta's explanation seems preferable to the usual rendering.

1 1243 = 597, except that $\epsilon \pi \epsilon \iota \tau$ ('thereafter') has replaced $a \tau a \rho \tau$ ('but'). The sense is unsatisfactory and West may well be right to treat $\epsilon \pi \epsilon \iota \tau$ as corrupt.

1245-46

Water and fire will never mix, and we will never be true friends to each other.

1247-48

Reflect on my hatred and your transgression,¹ and know in your heart that I will make you pay for your offence to the best of my ability.

1249-52

Boy, you're just like a horse; when you got your fill of barley, you came back to my stable, longing for your skilled charioteer, lovely meadow, cool spring water, and shady groves.¹

¹ Welcker's emendation 'kites,' a migratory bird, is attractive, especially in view of 1261, but the corruption is hard to explain.

1259-62

Boy, your form is handsome, but on your head there lies a stubborn and senseless crown. For you have in your heart the disposition of a close-wheeling kite, led on by what other men say.

gods. For I do not sit in judgement on trifling offences. 1 Of handsome boys . . . 2

Or "For I sit in judgement on no trifling offences."
 The poet may be saying that all handsome boys do wrong or that handsome boys can do wrong with impunity. In an erotic context 'doing wrong' involves failure to reciprocate the affection shown.

1283-94

Boy, don't wrong me. I still want to please you,¹ and I make this observation with all good cheer. Rest assured, you will not get the better of me nor will you trick me. For though (if?) you have won and have the advantage hereafter,² yet I shall wound³ you as you flee from me, as they say once the daughter of Iasius, the maiden Iasie, who was ripe for marriage, refused men and fled. Girding herself, blonde Atalanta left her father's home and tried to accomplish what was not to be accomplished. She went off to the lofty mountain peaks, fleeing from lovely marriage, the gift of golden Aphrodite. But in the end she came to know it, in spite of her refusal.⁴

¹ Many editors treat this as parenthetic: "Boy, don't wrong me—I still want to please you—but understand this with all good cheer." This is unnecessarily harsh. ² Translation uncertain. ³ An erotic metaphor. ⁴ West (Studies 165-67) and Vetta argue that what follows the middle of 1288 has been inserted from a different poem on Atalanta, but I agree with those who reject this. Just as Atalanta refused marriage but eventually succumbed to Milanion, so the boy has refused the poet's love but in the end will be won over. No reference to Atalanta's race with Hippomenes need be seen. For recent discussions of the poem see Lustrum 33 (1991) 213-14.

Boy, don't stir up my soul in the midst of my cruel torments¹ and don't let my love for you carry me off to the house of Persephone.² Respect the wrath of the gods and the talk of men, and conceive kindly thoughts.

² A reference to suicide.

1299-1304

Boy, how long will you flee from me? How I pursue and seek you out! May there come some end (to my eager desire for you?). But you, with lustful and arrogant heart and with the cruel ways of the kite, keep fleeing. Come, wait up and grant me your favour. Not for long will you possess the gift of the violet-crowned Cyprus-born.¹

¹ I.e., youth is short-lived and when the young have passed beyond adolescence Aphrodite no longer causes them to inspire passion in others.

Realizing in your heart that the bloom of lovely boyhood passes more swiftly than a footrace, reflect on this and release me from my bonds, lest one day you too, mighty boy, be overpowered and encounter the harsh workings of the Cyprus-born, just as I now do with you. Guard against this and do not let bad behaviour get the better of you . . .

You were not their friend before, whereas I thought that out of all I would make you a loyal comrade. Go ahead, take another friend now; but I, your benefactor, am laid low. Boy, since the Cyprian goddess gave you a beauty that arouses desire and all the young men are obsessed with your looks, listen to these words of mine and take them to heart as a favour to me, knowing that love is hard for a man to bear.¹

Boy, as long as you have a chin that is smooth, I'll never stop praising you, not even if it is destined that I die.¹ It's a fine thing still for you the giver and it's not shameful for me the lover to ask. 1341-50

Alas, I am in love with a soft-skinned boy who shows me off to all my friends in spite of my unwillingness. I'll put up with the exposure—there are many things that one is forced to do against one's will—for it's by no unworthy boy that I was shown to be captivated.¹ And there is some pleasure in loving a boy, since once in fact even the son of Cronus, king of the immortals, fell in love with Ganymede,² seized him, carried him off to Olympus, and made him divine, keeping the lovely bloom of boyhood. So, don't be astonished, Simonides,³ that I too have been revealed as captivated by love for a handsome boy.

TESTIMONIA

1 Suda

Phocylides, a philosopher from Miletus and contemporary of Theognis. Both flourished 647 years after the Trojan War, in the 59th Olympiad (544/41). Phocylides wrote hexameters and elegies² containing admonitions or maxims. Some give them the title Main Topics; they are lifted from the Sibylline books.³

¹ Cf. Theognis test. 1. Other sources give an Olympiad earlier or later. ² West, JHS 98 (1978) 164-67, denies that Phocylides wrote elegies and argues that the hexameter fragments came from one gnomic poem (see n. 2 on fr. 1). ³ A reference to the Pseudo-Phocylidea, a collection of 230 gnomic hexameters written probably early in the 1st cent. A.D. For a text, translation, and commentary on these see P. W. Van der Horst, The Sentences of Pseudo-Phocylides (Leiden 1978).

2 Plutarch, On Listening

One might find fault with Archilochus for his subject matter, Parmenides for his versification, Phocylides for his impoverished language, Euripides for his garrulity, and Sophocles for his unevenness . . . Nevertheless, each is praised for the individual capacity nature has given him to move and lead us on.

From Phocylides:

This too is by Phocylides. The tribes of women originated from these four: one from a bitch, one from a bee, one from a bristly¹ sow, one from a long-maned mare. The last bears herself well, is swift, a gadabout, and of the finest form. The one from a bristly sow is neither bad nor good. The one from a bitch is difficult and wild. The one from a bee is a good housekeeper and knows how to work. Pray, dear friend, to obtain delightful marriage with her as your lot.²

And he replied with a laugh, "For my part I don't even know the second poet's name, nor do I think any of these men knows it." . . . You people do not know Phocylides, as you state, and yet he is one of the highly renowned poets. . . . "So too," I said, "you may take a brief sample from the poetry of Phocylides. For he is not one of those who string together long and continuous poetry . . . but his poetry has a beginning and end in two or three verses. And so he attaches his name to each sentiment, believing as he does that it is a serious matter and of great importance, unlike Homer who nowhere named himself in his poetry. Or don't you think that Phocylides had good reason to attach his name to such a maxim and pronouncement as this?"

This too is by Phocylides. A small and orderly city on a height is superior to foolish Nineveh. 1

Nineveh, capital of Assyria, was destroyed by the Medes in 612, but the couplet need not have been composed shortly after the event.

5 Phrynichus, Selection of Attic Nouns and Verbs γογγυσμός ('muttering') and γογγύζειν ('to mutter'): these are not disreputable words, but are Ionic. For I know that Phocylides of Miletus, a very ancient man, used it:

To be a philosopher and to theorize is better than to make money, but it is not preferable for those who are in need and are unable to escape from it. For, in the words of Phocylides:

Seek a livelihood, and whenever you have it, seek excellence.¹

l Plato Rep. 3.407a seems to have this passage in mind when he attributes to Phocylides the necessity to practise excellence $(\mathring{a}\rho\epsilon\tau\mathring{\eta}\nu\ \mathring{a}\sigma\kappa\epsilon\hat{\iota}\nu)$ whenever anyone has made his livelihood $(\mathring{o}\tau a\nu\ \tau\psi\ \mathring{\eta}\delta\eta\ \beta\acute{\iota}os\ \mathring{\eta})$.

FRAGMENTS

1 Aristotle, Nicomachean Ethics

That unrestraint is not a vice is clear (although in a way perhaps it is), since unrestraint is over and above deliberate choice, whereas vice is in accordance with it. Nevertheless, it is the same in its actions, as in what Demodocus said about the Milesians:

Similarly the unrestrained are not unjust, but they act unjustly.

¹ Unless West is right that Phoc. fr. 1 (see n. 2 ad loc.) is actually the work of Demodocus, we should treat this as a spurious couplet modeled on Phocylides. The last word in v. 2 is arbitrarily accented Xios instead of Xios so as to make it scan.

West prints as frr. 3-5 three epigrams from the Palatine Anthology which follow immediately after fr. 2 and which have the heading $\tau o \hat{v}$ $a \hat{v} \tau o \hat{v}$ ("by the same"). They are treated by West and others as spurious and so are omitted here. A translation can be found in the Loeb Greek Anthology iv.183.

TESTIMONIA

Only the elegiac fragments and two of the many testimonia are included here. All the fragments and testimonia are printed by Gentili-Prato and all are translated by J. H. Lesher, Xenophanes of Colophon (Toronto 1992). Most of the testimonia refer to his philosophical views.

1 Diogenes Laertius, Lives of the Philosophers

Xenophanes, the son of Dexius or, according to Apollodorus, of Orthomenes, from Colophon, is praised by Timon.¹ At any rate he says: "Xenophanes, moderately free of vanity, censorious of Homer's deceit." Banished from his homeland, (he spent time?) in Zancle in Sicily 4 and he also spent time in Catana. . . . He wrote in hexameters as well as elegiac and iambic poems against Hesiod and Homer, censuring what they said about the gods. But he also recited his own works. He is said to have opposed the views of Thales and Pythagoras, and he also attacked Epimenides. He lived a very long life, as he himself states somewhere (fr. 8). . . . He composed poems on both the foundation of Colophon and the colonization of Elea in Italy, two thousand verses. And he flourished in the 60th Olympiad (540-537).

Xenophanes, an iambic poet from Lesbos.9

¹ A sceptic philosopher and poet, 3rd c. B.C. ² Sextus Empiricus, Outlines of Pyrrhonism 1.224, quotes the same verse, but in the nominative. ³ See n. 3 on fr. 8. 4 Diels was probably right to propose a reference in the lacuna to the poet's sojourn in Elea (on the west coast of Italy). ⁵ An example is fr. 11 D.-K.: "Homer and Hesiod have attributed to the gods all that are matters of reproach and blame among men: theft, adultery, and mutual deceit." There are no iambic poems extant, but fr. 14 D.-K. consists of an iambic trimeter followed by an hexameter. This reminds us of 'Homer,' Margites, and F. Bossi, Studi sul Margite (Ferrara 1986) 39-43, suggests that this poem was composed by Xenophanes. 6 See frr. 7, 7a. 7 It is unknown whether these were in hexameters or in elegiac verse. 8 Several other sources record the same or almost the same date, but Clement, Miscellanies 1.64.2, states that according to Apollodorus (FGrHist 244 F 68c) Xenophanes was born in the 40th Olympiad (620-617). This date has been generally rejected: for a detailed study of the question see L. Woodbury, Collected Writings (Atlanta 1991) 96-117. 9 Nothing is known of this poet.

2 Proclus on Hesiod, Works and Days

Because of some mean-spiritedness towards contemporary philosophers and poets, Xenophanes composed strange *Silloi*¹ against all philosophers and poets.

¹ This was the title of a work in hexameters by Timon of Phlius (see test. 1) who frequently praised Xenophanes and actually dedicated his Silloi to him. We do not know the etymology of the word, but it clearly means something like "lampoons" and it may be a synonym of Parodies (Παρφδίαι) which Athenaeus (2.54c) uses to introduce Xen. fr. 22 D.-K. Xenophanes' Silloi comprised at least five books and were in hexameters, perhaps with occasional iambic trimeters interspersed.

FRAGMENTS

Elegies

1 Athenaeus, Scholars at Dinner

Since then I myself see that your symposium, in accordance with Xenophanes of Colophon, is full of every delight:

For now the floor is clean and clean the hands of everyone and the cups;¹ (one servant) places woven garlands round (the heads of the guests), and another offers sweet-smelling perfume in a saucer; the mixing-bowl stands filled with good cheer; on hand is additional wine, which promises never to run out, mellow in its jars and fragrant with its bouquet; in the middle incense sends forth its pure and holy aroma and there is water, cool, sweet, and clear;² nearby are set golden-brown loaves and a magnificent table laden with cheese and thick honey; in the centre an altar is covered all over with flowers, and song and festivity pervade the room.

For men of good cheer it is meet³ first to hymn the god⁴ with reverent tales and pure words, after pouring libations and praying for the ability to do what is right—for in truth this is a more obvious⁵ thing to do, not deeds of violence; it is meet to drink as much as you can hold and come home without an attendant unless you are very old, and to praise that man who after drinking reveals noble thoughts, so that there is a recollection of and striving for excellence; it is not meet to make an array of the wars of

 1 Xenophanes seems to be describing an ideal symposium, not one actually in progress. The meal presumably formed the subject of the verses omitted at the beginning. 2 To be mixed with the wine. 3 I have assumed that $\chi\rho\acute{\eta}$ (v. 13) governs the infinitives in vv. 17, 19, 21, and 24, but some explain them as imperatives and an infinitive may not be the correct text in v. 21. 4 Probably Apollo or Dionysus. 5 Meaning uncertain; literally "closer at hand."

2 Athenaeus, Scholars at Dinner

And it is not surprising that these men became gluttons. For all athletes are taught to eat large amounts in connection with their gymnastic exercises. That is why Euripides says in his first Autolycus . . . These sentiments have been taken by Euripides from the elegiac verses of Xenophanes of Colophon who spoke as follows:

But if someone were to gain a victory by the swiftness of his feet or in the pentathlon, where there is the precinct of Zeus by Pisa's stream in Olympia, or in wrestling or engaging in painful boxing or in that terrible contest which they call the pankration,3 he would have greater renown (than others) in the eyes of his townsmen, he would gain a conspicuous front seat at the games, he would have food from the public store granted by the city, and a gift which would be a treasure for him—or if (he were to gain a victory) even with his horses, he would obtain all these things, although he is not as deserving as I. For my expertise4 is better than the strength of men or horses. But this custom is quite irrational and it is not right to give strength precedence over good expertise. For neither if there were a good boxer among the people nor one good at the pentathlon or in wrestling or again in the swiftness of his feet, the most honoured of the deeds of human strength in the contest, would there for that reason be better law and order in the city. Little would be the city's joy, if one were to win while contending by the banks of Pisa; for this does not fatten the city's treasury.

Xenophanes makes many other contentions with regard to his own wisdom, criticizing the idea of athleticism as useless and unprofitable.

 1 The pentathlon involved running, jumping, throwing the discus, throwing the javelin, and wrestling. 2 Presumably the river Alpheus. Pisa was a town near Olympia. 3 A combination of wrestling and boxing. 4 The precise meaning of $\sigma o \phi i \eta$ is uncertain. My preference is to see in it both poetic skill and the wise content of his verses.

Although the Colophonians, as Phylarchus says, were originally austere in their ways, when they became friends and allies of the Lydians and drifted into a soft life, they would go forth with their hair decked out with gold ornaments, as Xenophanes also says:

And having learned useless luxury from the Lydians, while they were free of hateful tyranny, they used to go to the agora wearing robes all of purple, no fewer than a thousand as a rule, proud and exulting (?) in the splendour of their hair, drenched with the scent of the most refined unquents.

And they were so dissolute because of untimely drinking that some of them saw neither the rising nor the setting sun. . . . And Theopompus in the fifteenth book of his Histories says that a thousand of them frequented the city wearing purple robes, a colour which then was rare even for kings and was much sought after.

¹ Presumably that inflicted by the Medes in the 540s.
² It is unclear whether this means place of assembly or market-place.
³ Either a ruling aristocracy or simply a large number of rich Colophonians.
⁴ Casaubon's reading is syntactically sound, but the elision of -οι is unparalleled, though perhaps not impossible. Various emendations have been suggested in order to introduce a reference to the gold ornaments mentioned in the source.

Cicero, On the State: "so that, as he (Phylarchus) writes, every day a thousand men went down into the forum in robes dyed with purple."

It was the custom to put water in the cup first and after that the wine. Cf. Xenophanes:

And Xenophanes of Colophon also says in his elegiac verses:

For although you sent the thigh bone of a kid, you won the fat leg of a fatted bull, a thing of honour to fall to a man whose fame will spread over the whole of Greece and will not die, so long as the Grecian form of song exists.

¹ It is unclear whether "whose" refers to the man or to the fat leg of a bull. Perhaps the poet is satirizing an athlete whose sacrifice prior to the games was much inferior to the reward he received by his victory, and yet his fame will be celebrated in song throughout the land. If so, the verses bear a certain resemblance to fr. 2.

These are the words of Xenophanes.

¹ It is unclear whether Xenophanes is mocking the Pythagorean belief in the transmigration of souls as such or simply the idea that one could recognize a soul from the yelping of a dog.

Xenophanes lived a very long life, as he himself states somewhere:

The verb $\gamma\eta\rho\hat{\omega}$ (2nd sing. $\gamma\eta\rho\hat{q}s$), 'grow old,' belongs to both the first and the second conjugation, like $\pi\iota\mu\pi\lambda\hat{\omega}$, 'fill,' which has both $\pi\iota\mu\pi\lambda\hat{q}s$ and $\pi\iota\mu\pi\lambda\hat{\epsilon}is$, as in (fragment corrupt). Similarly then $\gamma\eta\rho\hat{\omega}$ which has both $\gamma\eta\rho\hat{q}s$... and $\gamma\eta\rho\hat{\epsilon}is$... The participle is $\gamma\eta\rho\hat{\epsilon}is$, "growing old in the house." The genitive is $\gamma\eta\rho\hat{\epsilon}\nu\tau\sigma s$ like $\tau\iota\theta\hat{\epsilon}\nu\tau\sigma s$. Cf. Asius of Samos, perhaps to be dated to the 6th century, is primarily known as an epic poet. For the testimonia and epic fragments see A. Bernabé, Poetae Epici Graeci i.127-31, or M. Davies, Epicorum Graecorum Fragmenta 88-91. The testimonia tell us nothing about the man except that his father was Amphiptolemus (Paus. 2.6.3, 7.4.1).

"That's because you have no interest in history, you glutton," Myrtilus replied. "For you are a fat-licker and, as Asius, that Samian poet of old, puts it, a fat-flatterer. . . ." And so, after Myrtilus had had a drink, Ulpian asked again: "Where is 'fat-licker' found and what are the verses of Asius about the 'fat-flatterer'?" "The verses of Asius," Myrtilus replied, "are as follows:

Lame, tattooed,¹ aged, like a beggar came the fatflatterer,² uninvited and in need of soup, when Meles was getting married; and in their midst he stood, a hero risen from the mud.³

And 'fat-licker'" etc.

Meles or is there a suppressed comparison, "like a hero," or should Blaydes' slight emendation be adopted, "in the midst of the heroes"? See G. L. Huxley, Greek Epic Poetry (London 1969) 97, and L. Edmunds, HSCP 85 (1981) 230.

And the one who most of all aided him (Nicias) in acting this solemn role and in surrounding him with a cloak of self-important dignity was Hieron, a man who had been reared in the household of Nicias and thoroughly trained by him in letters and the liberal arts. He pretended to be the son of Dionysius called Chalcus (the Bronze), whose poems are in fact extant and who as leader of the colony sent to Italy founded Thurii.¹

Apollo also gave an oracle concerning Chariton and those about him, placing the pentameter before the hexameter, just as was later done by the Athenian Dionysius, called Chalcus, in his elegies.¹

¹ Fr. 1 may be an example of this.

4 Anonymous on Aristotle, Rhetoric

By Dionysius the Bronze he means the gravestone of Dionysius. In the elegiac verses inscribed on his gravestone Dionysius calls his poetry "the scream of Calliope." ¹

FRAGMENTS

1-4 Athenaeus, Scholars at Dinner¹

Dionysius called Chalcus (Bronze) mentions the wine drops and games of cottabus² in his elegies as follows:

¹ The number of poems represented by these fragments is unclear. ² The cottabus in its various forms involved basically the throwing of wine drops at a target and the player often dedicated his toss to someone with a view to amorous success. For further details see Athenaeus 11.487d-e, 15.665a-69e, and F. Lissarrague, The Aesthetics of the Greek Banquet (Princeton 1987) 80-86, and cf. Critias fr. 2.

These things, dearest Timocrates, are not in Plato's words the light jests "of a young and handsome Socrates," but the serious pursuits of the scholars at dinner. For according to Dionysius Chalcus

At the beginning or the end what is better than that which is most desired?

¹ With this citation Athenaeus concludes his work. The first six words of the citation appear in Arist. Knights 1264-66, where the scholiast gives Pindar (fr. 89a) as the source. Eustathius on Il. 18.570 (iv.260.23 V.d.Valk) also quotes Dionysius' fragment (without naming the author) and calls it "proverbial."

7 Aristotle, Rhetoric

A fault also lies in the combination of letters if it does not represent a pleasing sound, as for instance in Dionysius Chalcus who in his elegies calls poetry

the scream of Calliope, since although both words represent sounds,1 the metaphor is in bad taste because . . .

TESTIMONIA

1 Harpocration, Lexicon of the Ten Attic Orators

Euenus. Hyperides in the speech Against Autocles (c. 360). Two elegiac poets named Euenus are recorded, according to Eratosthenes in his work On Annals who says that they were both from Paros, but that only the younger was well-known. One of them is mentioned by Plato (see testt. 5-7).

¹ This is the only explicit reference to two poets named Euenus, apart from the Suda (ii.449.4 Adler) which simply repeats Harpocration. Jerome (p. 111.12 Helm) gives 460 as the floruit of an Euenus and if this is the same Euenus as Plato makes a contemporary of Socrates, he must have lived a very long life. The Suda (iv.726.26 Adler) states that the historian Philistus was a pupil of the elegiac poet Euenus and Philistus was born c. 430. There were also two or more poets named Euenus included in the Greek Anthology (see Gow-Page, The Garland of Philip ii.289) and one of the poems ascribed to Euenus is usually assigned to the 5th-cent. poet (see fr. 2).

2 Artemidorus, Interpretation of Dreams

The animal called camel ($\kappa \acute{a}\mu \eta \lambda o_{S}$) bends its thighs in the middle, thereby reducing the height of its legs. The κεκλημένον κάμηλος οἱονεὶ *κάμμηρος, ως φησιν Εὔηνος ἐν τοῖς εἰς Εὔνομον ἐρωτικοῖς.

καὶ τί, φησίν, ἀπολλύω;— Ἄνθρωπε, ὑπῆρχες αἰδήμων καὶ νῦν οὐκέτι εἶ· οὐδὲν ἀπολώλεκας; ἀντὶ Χρυσίππου καὶ Ζήνωνος ᾿Αριστείδην ἀναγιγνώσκεις καὶ Εὔηνον· οὐδὲν ἀπολώλεκας;

4 Auson. cento nupt. 10 (p. 168 Prete)

"lasciva est nobis pagina, vita proba," ut Martialis dicit (1.4.8)... nam quid Anniani Fescenninos, quid antiquissimi poetae Laevii Erotopaegnion libros loquar? quid Euenum, quem Menander sapientem vocavit (fr. 439 K.-A.)? quid ipsum Menandrum? quid comicos omnes? quibus severa vita est et laeta materia.

5 Pl. Apol. 20a-b

ἐπεὶ καὶ ἄλλος ἀνήρ ἐστι Πάριος ἐνθάδε σοφός, ὃν ἐγὼ ἦσθόμην ἐπιδημοῦντα· . . . "τίς τῆς τοιαύτης ἀρετῆς, τῆς ἀνθρωπίνης τε καὶ πολιτικῆς, ἐπιστήμων ἐστίν; . . . ἔστιν τις," ἔφην ἐγώ, "ἢ οὔ;" "πάνυ γε," ἢ δ' camel derives its name from $\kappa \acute{a}\mu\mu\eta\rho$ os ('bent-thigh'), as Euenus says in his Erotica addressed to Eunomus.¹

¹ The etymology is nonsense, but there is evidence for the erotic writings of an Euenus. See the next two testimonia.

3 Epictetus, Discourses

And what, someone says, do I lose?—Fellow, you used to be modest and now you are no longer. Have you lost nothing? Instead of Chrysippus and Zeno you read Aristides and Euenus. Have you lost nothing?

¹ Since the Aristides named is presumably the author (1st cent. B.C.) of the erotic Milesian Tales, Epictetus is referring to Euenus' erotic works. Wilamowitz, however, emended Εὖηνον to Εὖβιον: Eubius is mentioned along with Aristides in Ovid, Tristia 2.413-16. Chrysippus and Zeno were Stoic philosophers.

4 Ausonius, Nuptial Cento

"My page is wanton, but my life virtuous," as Martial says.
. . . For what shall I say of the Fescennine verses of Annianus, what of the volumes of Love Jests by Laevius, that most ancient poet? What of Euenus, whom Menander called wise? What of Menander himself? What of the comic poets? They combined an austere life with humorous subject matter.

5 Plato, Apology

For there is also another wise man here, a Parian, who I learned was in town.... "Who is knowledgeable in such excellence, both the human and political kind? . . . Is there anyone," I said, "or not?" "Certainly," he said. "Who is he,"

őς. "τίς," ἢν δ' ἐγώ. "καὶ ποδαπός, καὶ πόσου διδάσκει;" "Εὔηνος," ἔφη (scil. ὁ Καλλίας), "ὧ Σώκρατες, Πάριος, πέντε μνῶν." καὶ ἐγὼ τὸν Εὔηνον ἐμακάρισα, εἰ ὡς ἀληθῶς ἔχοι ταύτην τὴν τέχνην καὶ οὔτως ἐμμελῶς διδάσκει.

6 Pl. Phaed. 60d

περὶ γάρ τοι τῶν ποιημάτων ὧν πεποίηκας ἐντείνας τοὺς τοῦ Αἰσώπου λόγους καὶ τὸ εἰς τὸν ᾿Απόλλω προοίμιον καὶ ἄλλοι τινές με ἤδη ἤροντο, ἀτὰρ καὶ Εὔηνος πρώην, ὅ τι ποτὲ διανοηθείς, ἐπειδὴ δεῦρο ἦλθες, ἐποίησας αὐτά, πρότερον οὐδὲν πώποτε ποιήσας. εἰ οὖν τί σοι μέλει τοῦ ἔχειν ἐμὲ Εὐήνῳ ἀποκρίνασθαι ὅταν με αὖθις ἐρωτᾳ—εὖ οἶδα γὰρ ὅτι ἐρήσεται—εἰπὲ τί χρὴ λέγειν. "λέγε τοίνυν," ἔφη, "αὐτῷ, ὧ Κέβης, τὰληθῆ, ὅτι οὐκ ἐκείνῳ βουλόμενος οὐδὲ τοῖς ποιήμασιν αὐτοῦ ἀντίτεχνος εἶναι ἐποίησα ταῦτα—ἤδειν γὰρ ὡς οὐ ῥάδιον εἴη—ἀλλ' . . .

7 Pl. Phaedr. 267a

τὸν δὲ κάλλιστον Πάριον Εὔηνον ἐς μέσον οὖκ ἄγομεν; ὃς ὑποδήλωσίν τε πρῶτος ηὖρεν καὶ παρεπαίνους—οἱ δ᾽ αὐτὸν καὶ παραψόγους φασὶν ἐν μέτρῳ λέγειν, μνήμης χάριν—· σοφὸς γὰρ ἀνήρ.

I said, "from what country does he come, and how much does he charge for teaching?" "He is Euenus, Socrates," Callias said, "he is from Paros, and he charges five minae." And I deemed Euenus blessed, if he should really have this skill and teaches so reasonably.

6 Plato, Phaedo

For some others have already asked about the poems which you composed, putting into verse the fables of Aesop and the prelude to Apollo, and just the other day Euenus asked what your purpose was in composing them after you came here (i.e., to prison), when you had never done so before. If then you care about my being able to answer Euenus when he asks me again—for I am sure that he will—say what I am to tell him. "Very well, Cebes," he said, "tell him the truth, that I did not compose these poems because I wanted to compete with him or his poems—for I know that it would not be easy—but . . . "1 ¹Euenus is also mentioned several times in what immediately follows, but no new information about him is provided.

7 Plato, Phaedrus

Shall we not introduce the distinguished Parian, Euenus? He was the first to invent insinuation and incidental praise—and some say that he also put into verse, as an aid to memory, incidental censure; for he is a clever man.¹

m 1}$ These inventions indicate that Euenus employed an indirect method of praise and censure.

8 Max. Tyr. 38.4 (p. 449.73 Koniaris)

καὶ οὐδὲ αὐτή σοι (scil. ἡ ᾿Ασπασία τῷ Σωκράτει) ἀρκεῖ διδάσκαλος, ἀλλ᾽ ἐρανίζη παρὰ μὲν Διοτίμας τὰ ἐρωτικά, παρὰ δὲ Κόννου τὰ μουσικά, παρὰ δὲ Εὐήνου τὰ ποιητικά, παρὰ δὲ Ἰσχομάχου τὰ γεωργικά, παρά τε Θεοδώρου τὰ γεωμετρικά.

8 Maximus of Tyre, Discourses

And not even she (Aspasia) is a sufficient teacher for you (Socrates), but you receive as a contribution the erotic from Diotima, music from Connus, poetry from Euenus, agriculture from Ischomachus, and geometry from Theodorus.

9 Quintilian, Principles of Oratory

Let us therefore pass over this point too, that philology and music were once united, although in fact Archytas and also Euenus considered the former subordinate to the latter, and that the same were teachers of both is shown not only by Sophron . . . but also by Eupolis . . .

The best measure of Bacchus is that which is neither large, nor very small, for he is the cause either of grief or of madness.¹ He delights in being mixed as the fourth with three Nymphs;² then he's most ready for the bedroom.³ But if he should blow with gale force, he turns his back on love and plunges one into sleep, the neighbour of death.

¹ The meaning seems to be that a very small amount of wine is inadequate to dispel grief, while a large amount brings on madness. I have attempted to explain the imagery and language in Mnemosyne 41 (1988) 39-45.

"Well, then," one might say, "do these things contribute nothing to speech?" I for my part should say that they do, just as salt contributes to a dish and water to barley bread. And Euenus even claimed that fire was the best of seasonings. But we do not say that water is a part of barley bread or wheat bread or that fire or salt is a part of vegetables or meat.

¹ This same saying is attributed to Euenus in Plut. quomodo adulator internosc. 2.50a and quaest. conv. 7 praef. 697c-d, but in de tuenda san. 8.126c-d it is attributed to Prodicus (84 B 10 D.-K.).

CRITIAS

TESTIMONIA

Most of the testimonia on Critias pertain to his political career, association with Socrates, prose style, or moral character and are therefore omitted here. All the testimonia are printed in Die Fragmente der Vorsokratiker (as well as in Gentili-Prato) and are translated by D. N. Levin in R. K. Sprague (ed.), The Older Sophists (Columbia, S.C. 1972) 242-49. See also Archilochus test. 33 and Solon fr. 22a.

1 Diogenes Laertius, Lives of the Philosophers

Plato, the Athenian, was the son of Ariston and Perictione (or Potone), who traced her family back to Solon. For Solon's brother Dropides was the father of Critias who was the father of Callaeschrus. His sons were Critias, a member of the thirty (tyrants), and Glaucon, the father of Charmides and Perictione. Plato, the son of Perictione and Ariston, was in the sixth generation after Solon.

2 John Philoponus on Aristotle, On the Soul

It makes no difference to us whether Aristotle means Critias, one of the thirty (tyrants), who also listened to Socrates, or someone else. They say that there was also φιστήν, οὖ καὶ τὰ φερόμενα συγγράμματα εἶναι, ὡς ᾿Αλέξανδρος λέγει· τὸν γὰρ τῶν τριάκοντα μηδὲ γεγραφέναι ἄλλο τι πλὴν Πολιτείας ἐμμέτρους.

another Critias, a sophist and author of the writings in question, as Alexander states. For the member of the thirty has not written anything except the Well-balanced Constitutions.¹

¹ Or possibly "Constitutions in verse." Critias was the author of a Constitution of the Thessalians (88 B 31 D.-K.) and of the Spartans (B 32-37), but these were in prose. There is no evidence to support the claim of a second Critias.

3 Athenaeus, Scholars at Dinner

All the Greeks of old cared about music and hence they showed much zeal for pipe-playing. At any rate Chamaeleon of Heraclea in his Hortatory Treatise, as it is called, states that the Spartans and Thebans all learned to play the pipe and that the inhabitants of Heraclea on the Pontus still do individually, while among the Athenians the most conspicuous were Callias, the son of Hipponicus, and Critias, the son of Callaeschrus.

4 Mallius Theodorus, On Meters

Critias asserts that the dactylic hexameter was invented originally by Orpheus, ¹ Democritus by Musaeus.

¹ Diels-Kranz printed this as fr. 3, but there is no reason to assume that the statement occurred in an elegy.

Skilled Anacreon who is on the lips of everyone once constantly sang of Eros. Hence mighty Critias says the following about him:

Teos brought to Greece the one who once wove songs with strains celebrating women, sweet Anacreon, stimulus for symposia, seducer of women, opponent of the pipes, lover of the lyre, sweet, banisher of pain. Never will love of you grow old or perish, so long as a slave boy carries round water mixed with wine for the cups, dispensing toasts to the right, and female choruses conduct sacred allnight festivities, and the scale-pan, daughter of bronze, sits on the high and lofty top of the cottabus for the drops of Bromius.

¹ For the poetry of Anacreon see Campbell's Loeb edition, Greek Lyric ii.22 ff. According to the scholiast on Aesch. PV 128a (p. 93 Herington) Anacreon spent time in Athens "out of love for Critias" (Κριτίου ἐρῶν), i.e., the grandfather of our Critias.

2-9. Elegies

2 Athenaeus, Scholars at Dinner And Critias speaks as follows:¹

From the land of Sicily comes the cottabus,² a remarkable achievement; we set it up as a target for shafts of wine drops. Next, a Sicilian wagon is the most beautiful and expensive...³ A Thessalian chair is the most comfortable seat for the limbs. Miletus and Chios, Oenopian's⁴ city by the sea, are famed(?) for the beauty of the marriage bed.⁵ The Etruscan bowl of beaten gold prevails, and all the bronze that adorns a house for any use. Phoenicians invented letters as a means of preserving discourse. Thebes was the first to construct the carriage for a chariot, and Carians, stewards of the sea, cargo vessels.⁶ And she that set up the beautiful trophy at Marathon⁷ invented the offspring of wheel, earth, and oven, pottery of highest fame, a useful housekeeper.

And Attic pottery is truly praised.

¹ Athenaeus 1.27d-28d includes this passage among several which list the chief products of a particular place. ² See n. 2 on Dion. Chal. fr. 3. ³ Perhaps only a pentameter is missing.

⁴ In 1.26b-c Athenaeus, on the authority of Theopompus, states that Oenopian was a son of Dionysus, founded the island-state, and was the first to teach viticulture. See Ion fr. 29 (Greek Lyric iv.365).

⁵ Or perhaps simply "bed for sleeping."

4 Hephaestion, Handbook of Meters

... or two short syllables (are used) for one short, which is found in the other meters ... but rarely in hexameters. As a result Critias in his elegy on Alcibiades did not think that Alcibiades' name was allowable, for he says:

And now I shall crown the Athenian son of Cleinias, Alcibiades, with a song in a new manner. For it was not possible in any way to fit the name into elegiac verse; now it will lie, not unmetrically, in an iambic line.¹

 1 Iambic trimeters are occasionally found as a substitute for the pentameter, as here in v. 2, or for the hexameter.

5 Plutarch, Life of Alcibiades

Now the decree for his recall had been ratified earlier (411 B.C.), on the motion of Critias the son of Callaeschrus, as Critias himself has written in his elegiac verses, reminding Alcibiades of the favour as follows:

As for the proposal which restored you, I was the one who delivered it among all the people, and by my motion I accomplished this deed. The seal of my tongue is set on these (words?, verses?).¹

¹ Meaning uncertain (see n. 2 on Theognis 19-38), but probably Critias is referring either to the official copy of the decree which would contain the name of the mover and would be deposited in the state archives, so that "tongue" is in effect Critias' name, or to a purely metaphorical seal which consists of Critias' poetic style.

CRITIAS

6 Athenaeus, Scholars at Dinner

It was not the custom of the Spartans to propose toasts at drinking parties or to offer loving-cups by these means to one another. Critias makes this clear in his elegiac verses:¹

This too is the custom and established practice at Sparta: to drink from the same² wine-bearing cup, and not to give toasts while proposing them (to someone) by name, and not (to pass the cup?) to the right in the circle of company . . . 3 A Lydian hand, born in Asia, invented (wine) vessels,4 extending of toasts to the right, and challenging by name the person to whom one wishes to drink a toast. Then, as a result of such drinking their tongues are loosened into disgraceful words and their bodies are made weaker. Upon their eyes a dark mist settles, oblivion melts away memory from their minds, and reason is tripped up. The servants have an undisciplined manner and house-ruining extravagance bursts in. But Spartan youths drink only enough (to turn?) their mind to cheerful . . .,6 their tongue to friendliness and moderate laughter. Such drinking is beneficial for body, mind, and property. It is well suited to the deeds of Aphrodite and to sleep, a haven from toils, and to Health, most pleasing of the gods to mortals, and to Discretion, the neighbour of Piety.

He goes on to say again:

For toasts from cups that go beyond due measure, though they give momentary pleasure, bring grief for all time. But the Spartan way of life is evenly ordered: to eat and drink moderately so as to be able to think and work. There is no day set apart⁷ to intoxicate the body with immoderate drinking.

 1 Possibly from the work mentioned in test. 2. 2 I.e., one's own cup, without exchanging it for someone else's.

³ It is unclear whether the genitive depends on the preceding dative or on something in the following lacuna. The lacuna may involve more than one verse, since we expect to be told that vv. 3-4 refer to the drinking practice in Athens.

⁴ Probably nothing more than the common attribution of soft living to the Lydians.

⁵ I.e., unsteadiness caused by excessive drinking.

⁶ On the text see West, Studies 170, and A. Meriani, QUCC n.s. 56 (1997) 81–86.

⁷ As occurred in Athens for festivals of Dionysus. Cf. Plato, Laws 1.637b.

7 Scholiast on Euripides, Hippolytus ("And so I praise excess less than nothing in excess, and the wise will agree with me.")

Some attribute "nothing in excess" to the Spartan Chilon, as does Critias, others to Sodamus, as the epigram in Tegea makes clear: "Sodamus, son of Eperatus, who set me up, said these words: nothing in excess, to due measure belongs everything that is good."

Diogenes Laertius, Lives of the Philosophers

The utterances of the Seven Sages are variously attributed, now to one, now to another, such as the following:

ην Λακεδαιμόνιος Χίλων σοφός, δς τάδ' ἔλεξε· "μηδεν ἄγαν, καιρῷ πάντα πρόσεστι καλά."

CRITIAS

It was Chilon,² the Spartan sage, who said this: "Nothing in excess, to due measure belongs everything that is good."³

¹ See D. L. Page, Further Greek Epigrams 492-93. The disputed authorship is recorded also by Clem. Strom. 1.61.1 and schol. Pind. Pyth. 2.63 (ii.42.20 Dr.).

² A 6th-cent. Spartan statesman (see G. L. Huxley, Early Sparta [London 1962] 69-71) and one of the Seven Sages. For a list of apophthegms attributed to him see Vorsokr. i.63 D.-K. from Stobaeus 3.1.172.

³ Dietrich inserted the couplet after v. 21 of fr. 6. For v. 2 cf. Theognis 401.

8 Plutarch, Life of Cimon

Furthermore, Gorgias of Leontini says that Cimon acquired money so that he might use it and used it so that he might be honoured. And Critias who became one of the thirty (tyrants) prays in his elegies for the wealth of the Scopadae,¹ the magnanimity of Cimon, and the victories of the Spartan Arcesilaus.²

 1 Diod. Sic. 13.65 records a victory of the Athenians against a superior force of Megarians in 409. 2 Thought by some to be Critias. 3 Aristides or. 45 (ii.98 Dindorf) and the scholia ad loc. (iii.420.1) cite the verse and call it an epigram $(\hat{\epsilon}\pi\acute{\nu}\gamma\rho\alpha\mu\mu\alpha)$. 4 It is unclear whether this is Ariston. 5 Father of Glaucon, Adeimantus, and Plato.

2 Plato, Protagoras

It is possible for a good man to become bad, as is attested by another poet¹ who said:

but a good man is at one time bad, at another good²

 1 I.e., other than Simonides whose poem (fr. $542\,PMG$) on this topic is examined at some length in the dialogue. 2 No distinction, I think, is intended between $\mathring{a}\gamma \alpha\theta \acute{o}s$ and $\mathring{\epsilon}\sigma\theta\lambda\acute{o}s$. By 'good' is meant one who is held in esteem through birth, conduct, circumstances etc. and by 'bad' is meant the opposite. Perhaps 'worthy' and 'wretched' would be more accurate translations.

These things, lad, you should bear in mind, and you should know that a lover's friendship is not based on good will, but, like food, it is to get one's fill:

As wolves love a lamb, so lovers love a boy.

3 Aristotle, Nicomachean Ethics

Furthermore, error is multiform . . . but success is possible in one way only . . . And so because of this excess and deficiency are a mark of vice, whereas the mean is a mark of virtue:

The good are good in one way only, the bad are bad in all sorts of ways.

But if absence is prolonged, it seems to bring forgetfulness of friendship. Hence the statement:

Lack of discourse dissolves many a friendship.

6 Aristotle, Constitution of the Athenians

At a still earlier time than that of the Alcmaeonidae Cedon attacked the tyrants, 1 and hence they sang of him too in their scolia:

Pour a cup for Cedon² too, waiter, and don't forget him, if you are to pour wine for men of worth.³

¹ Hippias and Hipparchus, sons of Peisistratus. ² Otherwise unknown. ³ The couplet is also quoted by Athenaeus 15.695e among his examples of Attic scolia. For some ancient explanations of the term 'scolia,' see the Loeb Greek Lyric v.274-79, and for a commentary on the couplet see E. Fabbro, I carmi conviviali attici (Rome 1995) 182-85.

7 Theophrastus, On Winds

Since cloudy and clear skies are associated with each wind according to districts and places, for this reason some of the things said in proverbs are associated with certain places, as for example concerning the Northwest and the Southwest winds. The latter is especially strong round about Cnidus and Rhodes:

The Southwest wind quickly brings clouds and quickly a clear sky, but all the clouds accompany the Northwest wind.

hoc quoque notandum in enuntiatione pentametri elegiaci; nam plerumque aurem fallit, ut in illo Graeco versu:

ήμεις δ' είς Έλλης πόντον ἀπεπλέομεν.

nam si coniunctim Ἑλλήσποντον enuntiarimus, effugerit aurium sensum, ut nequaquam versus esse credatur; at si per hemistichium pronuntiemus, ipsa subdistinctione genus metri declarabimus, ita, ἡμεῖς δ' εἰς Ἑλλης, dehinc πόντον ἀπεπλέομεν.

while sang a song which is still sung even to our day:

To the middle of the Stenyclerian plain and to the mountain top Aristomenes¹ pursued the Spartans.

19 Athenaeus, Scholars at Dinner

... this was no foolish comment by the piper, for there is an ancient saying that

The gods did not implant sense in a piper, but with his blowing his sense flies out as well.

20 Aphthonius, On meters

This too should be noted in the delivery of the elegiac pentameter. Frequently the ear is deceived, as in the Greek verse,

We were sailing away to Helle's sea.

For if we pronounce Helle's sea as one word (Hellespont), it escapes the perception of the ear, with the result that it is not thought to be a verse at all. But if we pronounce it as a hemistich, we will show the type of meter by the very separation, namely, "to Helle's," then "sea we were sailing away."

27 Berlin papyrus (c. 300 B.C.)

Hail, fellow drinkers, (age-mates?). Fine was my beginning and fine will be the end of my discourse. Whenever we friends gather for such an activity, we ought to laugh and joke, behaving properly, take pleasure in being together, engage in foolish talk with one another, and utter jests such as to arouse laughter. But let seriousness follow and let us listen to the speakers in their turn: this is the best form of symposium. And let us obey the symposiarch: this is the conduct of good men and it wins praise.¹

¹ Or possibly "produces good discourse." For a commentary on the poem see F. Ferrari, SCO 38 (1988) 219-27.

¹ The compound occurs twice in Homer (Il. 12.384, 22.315) as a description of a helmet, but the meaning of $\phi \acute{a} \lambda o_{S}$ is unknown.

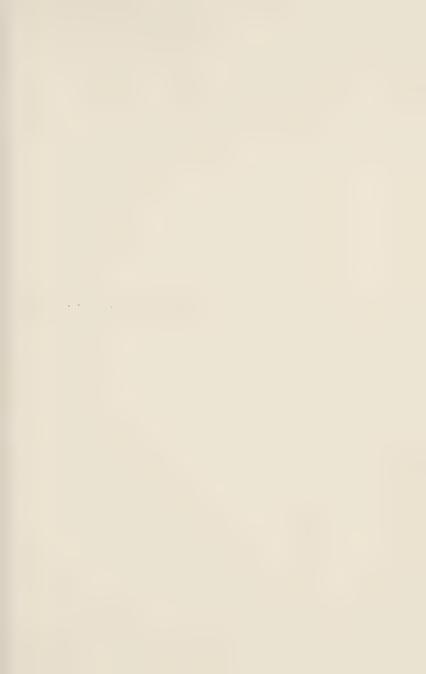

² It is unclear whether this marks the beginning of a speech, with v. 13 its end, or whether this concludes a speech and v. 13 begins a second one.

³ Carystus was at the southern end of Euboea and Eretria (v. 7) on the west coast of the island. Fighting in Euboea is mentioned in Archil. fr. 3. For the verb Lobel remarks: "The subjunctive may imply a clause of the form 'as far as stretches', say, the Carystian plain, ridge."
